In this war [he writes] Britain has stood from the first for respecting Hague Conventions and the rights of non-combatants. To imitate the policy of savagery carried out by the German Government in Belgium and France and by the Turkish Government in Armenia, would be to lower ourselves to the level of those Governments. Such reprisals would have no military effect, nor would the enemy be deterred from his policy of slaughtering the innocent—men, women, and children alike. The German bomb raids do not shake in the least our resolution to prosecute the war. Would British air raids of a like nature affect the German Government differently, or lead them to desist from useless cruelty? In reprisals, the German Government will, to use a popular expression, always "go one better." In a contest of inhumanity they will always be the winners.

WE cannot refrain from quoting another letter from The Times correspondence on this subject, because the matter is in itself of such importance for the higher mind of the nation, and these words by Prof. Pollard are an admirable example of mental balance and sound moral emphasis.

The plan of an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth means, I take it, that for every British civilian, woman or child killed—"murdered" it has been called—a German civilian woman and child is to be "murdered" in revenge. That is undiluted barbarism. Civilised peoples do not kill a criminal's womenfolk and children because they cannot lay hands on the criminal. It may also be futile folly. The idea is based on the assumption that the heart of the German Staff will be so moved by the slaughter of German women and children that it will call off the Zeppelins from England. I should like a better warrant for this German sensitiveness. If, as we hold, these attacks on open towns are of little or no military effect, they are not likely to move the German militarist; and we cannot beat the Germans in or by a competition in wanton brutality. Military effect, and not vengeance, is the sole legitimate criterion in war by land, sea, and air.

THE National Conference of Unitarian and other Free Churches which will meet in London next week has a cumbersome title, which is justified at the bar of history, but is impossible for popular use. It includes in its fellowship a body of Churches which have always claimed rightly to be within the Christian tradition, though the absence of authorised dogma has resulted in strongly individual developments both in doctrine and in character. Many of these Churches have their roots deep in a sacred past; they have an honourable place in the national expression of religion, and in the wide range of their spiritual sympathies they find a rich compensation for the ostracism which is imposed upon them by others sometimes through misunderstanding, sometimes by timidity or unkindness, and often in obedience to strong but narrow principles. They have played an important part in the long struggle for toleration and theological freedom, and many of their ablest men claim that, in spite of a remarkable change in public opinion in recent years, they still have a special testimony of their own to bear to the duty of intellectual candour in matters of belief, and the deep harmony which may exist between mental liberty and the richest graces of the Christian spirit.

THE Conference was postponed in the spring owing to the war. It will meet now at a less convenient season of the year, and under the shadow of heavier national anxiety. In these circumstances the attendance is not likely to be large, and the programme has been wisely curtailed. Apart from the sermon by Dr. Jacks and the address by Prof. Gilbert Murray, which are certain to appeal to a wider audience, the interest will centre round the discussion on the 'Report on Public Worship,' which appeared in an abridged form in our columns some time ago. Many people probably feel that it is a subject which it is singularly difficult to debate to any profit at the present time, not only because the whole energy of our thinking is engaged elsewhere, and the domestic problems of the Churches before the war have become strangely distant, but even more because none of us can have any clear idea of the conditions under which the Churches will have to live and do their work when the war is over. We shall find ourselves in a sterner world, beset by fiercer difficulties, and exposed to a discipline more searching than any we have known before. Our resources for pleasure will be crippled. A new seriousness of purpose may come as the blessing of misfortune. If that be so, none of the old problems will be the same; and perhaps the problem of public worship, which has agitated the Churches in recent years, will find its solution not in the disturbed atmosphere of public discussion, but through a deeper sense of inward need.

A DANGER.

THERE is a sense in which the very goodness of our cause is a positive danger to us. We have no doubt about it; we are in the right, and in that conviction the opinion of the civilised world, outside of Germany and her allies, confirms us. That being so, who can doubt the issue? The right must prevail. From that position it is only too easy to slide into one which is not merely unreasonable but positively dangerous. If so great a power is really fighting on our side is there after all any necessity for us individually to make the efforts and sacrifices which are demanded of us? Let us trust in our rightness to see us through and meanwhile, so far as possible, "business as usual." That, of course, is not the attitude of the thousands of men and women who are fighting, working, and dying for us, and for something much greater than we are; but it, or something like it, does seem to be the frame of mind of a good many others. They know that, if life is to be worth living for free men, we must win. They believe that we shall win. Any other result would be too incredibly disastrous. But they do not seem to realise that it is up to them individually to contribute to the victory. We too often deal with our great ideals as if they were pictures to be hung on our walls, or rare curios to be locked up in our cabinets, not as channels into which our energies should be poured or ends upon which those energies should be concentrated. Our ideals will do little for us on those lines just because we do little for them. Ours is still a divided nation, although much of the old party strife has been so happily stilled. It is divided between the people who are in deadly earnest about the war and those who are more in earnest about something else; between those who are ready to work for our ideals at any cost to themselves, and those who are content to leave those ideals to realise themselves with such assistance as others may be inclined to give.

It is not only the selfish and indifferent who get on the wrong side in this division. There is a type of religious thought which leads some astray. "It is in God's hands," they say, "we will put our trust in Him and He will see us through." Yes, and no. Yes, if we have done our level best to help ourselves. No, if we are seeking to throw upon Him the burden which we should ourselves bear. There is after all some truth in the brutal saying that "God is on the side of the big battalions," in so far as it means that He is on the side of those who put forth the whole of their own strength in a good cause.

We have something to learn from the Germans in this matter. They, too, are fighting for an ideal. We cannot call it a "great" ideal for that word connotes a moral quality which it does not possess. But it is big, or, in their own favourite phrase, "kolossal." And it has enlisted their enthusiasm and roused their energies in a way which our ideal has not yet done with all of us. We make a mistake if we suppose that it is the Kaiser and the military circles only which have gone mad for world power. It is a very large portion of the German people, and even those who are not the victims of this lust for power are held loyal by the intense love of their country which is so marked in all classes of German society. Let us give our meed of admiration where it is due—not to the ideals and aims of our enemies, but to the zeal and self-sacrifice which they are throwing into so bad a cause.

It is a real danger which confronts us here—the danger of thinking that the goodness of our cause will do for us what we must do for ourselves, that the cause will serve us instead of our serving the cause. It can only serve us by inspiring us to even greater services and sacrifices. So in the end shall it be triumphant, and we—well, does it matter much what becomes of us individually? There will be an England left, chastened and ennobled by our suffering and our losses, an England recalled to her best traditions, and proven worthy of her great estate. That ought to be enough for us.

IGNOTUS.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

WE can endure that he should waste our lands,
Despoil our temples, and by sword and flame Return us to the dust from which we came;
Such food a Tyrant's appetite demands;
And we can brook the thought that by his hands
Spain may be overpowered, and he possess,
For his delight, a solemn wilderness
Where all the brave lie dead. But, when of bands
Which he will break for us he dares to speak,
Of benefits, and of a future day
When our enlightened minds shall bless his sway;
Then, the strained heart of fortitude proves weak;
Our groans, our blushes, our pale cheeks declare
That he has power to inflict what we lack strength to bear.

WORDSWORTH.

It must be obvious to a reflecting mind that everything which is desperately immoral, being in its constitution monstrous, is of itself perishable; decay it cannot escape, and further it is liable to sudden dissolution. For he stands upon a hideous precipice (and it will be the same with all who may succeed to him and his iron sceptre), he who has outlawed himself from society by proclaiming, with word and act, that he acknowledges no mastery but power.... For present annoyance [Napoleon's] power is, no doubt, mighty, but liberty in which it originated and of which it is a depravation, is far mightier, and the good in human nature is stronger than the evil. If the tide of success were by any effort fairly turned, occasion would be given for the discontented to break out, and above all for the triumph of human nature; it would then be seen whether men fighting in a bad cause—men without magnanimity, honour, or justice—could recover, and stand up against champions who by these virtues were carried forward in good fortune, as by these virtues in adversity they have been sustained. As long as guilty actions thrive, guilt is strong; it has a giddiness and transport of its own, a hardihood not without superstition, as if Providence were a party to its success. But disaster opens the eyes of conscience, and in the minds of men who have been employed in bad actions, defeat and a feeling of punishment are inseparable. On the other hand, the power of an unblemished heart and a brave spirit is shown, in the events of war, not only among unpractised citizens and peasants, but among troops in the most perfect discipline.... This paramount efficacy of moral causes, is indisputable.

'The Convention of Cintra,'

WORDSWORTH.

O GOD, the Father of Consolation, let me neither desire anything against thy will, nor in disappointment seek comfort away from thee; but knowing thy will to comprehend what is best in both my own life and my neighbour's, and in that of all creatures, let me ever resign myself to thy disposal who out of evil bringest good, and to whom our prayer should be in perfect peace. Give us what thou seest fit, only fit us for what thou givest. Amen.

FEELING THE FAR THING.

ONCE upon the cliffs of the Cornish coast I picked up a curious little object. It looked for all the world in shape and colour like a miniature loaf of bread. The rounded top was done red brown to a nicety, and the flatter under side had the paler hue which befalls the part protected by the tin mould. At the time I had no idea what it was, and for that reason it was carried as a curiosity to my Kentish home three hundred miles away. Some weeks afterwards its true nature was revealed. It had lain upon my writing desk all the while, one of the many useless objects requiring daily dusting. One day as I was quietly scribbling one of the weekly prophecies, my mind far away in Egypt or Palestine, or withdrawn in wildered wandering through some ethical maze, my toy loaf moved, and sense became vividly awake. There was an internal commotion of some kind, for presently there was a rent, and my beautifully baked model of a quartern loaf was suffering disruption; something alive was about to emerge, and I was soon to witness that phenomenon whose interest will never stale nor wither, the birth of a higher form of life from the tomb of a lower, the radiant resurrection of a winged being from the sealed sepulchre of a crawling worm.

But while my mind was all intent upon the efforts of the creature struggling to free itself from its encasing cocoon, my attention was suddenly drawn to something wildly fluttering at the panes of the window, as if impatient for admission. It was a moth of the same kind as that which was now half way through the crust of my Cornish curio, one of the eggar moths. I had hoped to keep my prize a precious captive for some days to show those friends who had been interested in the cocoon, but I would not spoil the romance of even insect rovers, so I opened the window and watched my released prisoner and her mate flutter out on the evening air while the breeze made music in the trees, and the west became flushed with a glow of imminent joy. These eggars—so called from their mode of making egg-shelled and comparatively hard cocoons—have many interesting characteristics. The only one here to be mentioned is the mysterious faculty of finding each other out at long distances, even ten or twelve miles off. It can be due to the intensification of no sense. It may be some psychic gift, a kind of telæsthesia. The unadorned fact is that the knight knows afar off, even before the bride has come forth in glory of brown and gold from her chamber, and in strong rapid flight he wings his way to where she is waiting, requiring no chart for the way, but with unerring instinct traversing alien tracts of air, beating at unfamiliar doors, and claiming that partner by every right his own. And she knows him not by the distinguishing white mark on the forewing, not by the beautiful pectinated antennæ, but by some inner intuition corresponding to the wonderful detective insight by which, braving the dangers of the long journey, he finds her out. And if, in so elementary a stage in the progress of living this perception at a distance is a demonstrable fact, why should we doubt that among the more sensitive children of men it does not exist and in still more marvellous manifestations? An American authoress tells a story of a young man living alone in his cabin, seeing as in a fine strong dream the girl destined to be his wife, and spending years in seeking her out and winning her. Why should it be strange that love is aware that it is not well with someone cared for in a distant land, though no message has yet come to tell the nature of the trouble? Why should it be strange that the dreamer should smile in the moment of failure because of some irresistible assurance that success is only postponed, and is all the more sure? Do not coming sorrows cast their shadows before, and coming joys communicate a foretaste of the fated triumph already on the way? Why should the new experience so often carry the sense of being the fulfilment of a long expectation? Why should we feel with so many new faces that it is really a recognition, a re-union, this first meeting? Perhaps the popular fancies that someone is saying nice things of you when your ears grow red, or less complimentary when your nostrils are tickled, may have their grain of truth. And the poet may not be so mad as he sounds when he makes the red rose announce the coming of his own dear love, and the larkspur listen, and the lily whisper.

She is coming, my own, my sweet;
Were it ever so airy a tread,
My heart would hear her and beat,
Were it earth in an earthy bed.

And when out of the benign canopy of evening descends a sweetness, a solace, that smooth out the corrugations of care, and still the fret and fever of the heart, and lure out of their hiding longings for forgotten friends and vanished days, who knows but some former comrade, free from the flesh, has for a moment stopped on his journey and laid a hand of healing upon the throbbing brain, and two worlds have met at a touch, and two lives coalesced in a divine sympathy? For

Thou shalt know him when he comes
Not by any din of drums,
Nor the vantage of his airs;
Neither by his crown,
Nor his gown,
Nor by anything he wears.
He shall only well-known be
By the holy harmony
That his coming makes in thee!

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

THE WORK OF CANON BARNETT.

PRACTICABLE SOCIALISM. By the late Canon Barnett and Mrs. S. A. Barnett. New Series. (London: Longmans & Co., 6s. net.)

MANY of our readers will remember the appearance of the first series of papers known as 'Practicable Socialism' in 1888. Scores of more ambitious books have been published since, but none more helpful or more strongly marked with personal qualities. It belonged to the days when theories of reform counted for less than personal service and work in the slums of our great cities had the novelty of romance. As we take it down from the shelves it revives memories of the beginnings of the Whitechapel Art Gallery, or Sunday evenings at St. Jude's, or the sanctified common sense with which Canon Barnett pleaded with us to make friendship the basis of our work. We can give this new series no higher praise than to say that it is worthy of its predecessor. It consists of a number of papers grouped under the headings Religion, Recreation, Settlements, Poverty and Labour, Social Service and Education. Most of them belong to recent years; they are the mature fruit of a mind of singular balance and sobriety, for which human nature was always the fundamental fact. It was this quality which saved Canon Barnett's work from the restlessness which has weakened the efforts of many reformers. He never abandoned himself either to abstract theories or to stormy revolt, but possessed his soul in the "passionate patience" which he recommended to others. He owed much to his instinctive sympathy and his shrewd judgment, but the real secret lay deeper. No man of our time saw more clearly than he that kindness rapidly becomes sterile apart from the love of God.

"Kindness," he writes, "is no evidence of the presence of religion. Kindness may, indeed, be a deposit of religion, a habit inherited from forefathers who drew into themselves love from the Source of Love, or it may be something learned in the common endurance of hardships. Kindness, generosity, public spirit cannot certainly be identified with the religion which has made human beings feel joy in sacrifice and given them peace in the pains of death." Others have said much the same thing not without a suspicion of unreality or over-strain. He had a right to say it; from him the words are transparently sincere, the fruit of real insight, because his own life was steeped in kindness. This religious note, quiet but strong, may be felt in everything he wrote. It was natural to him to think of religion first of all in connection with the duties of the neighbour and the citizen. For this reason he took no part in ecclesiastical disputes. He was one of the least clerical of the clergy. The church to him was the nation on its religious side. His view of the Church of England, "of which every Englishman is a member, and whose Prayer Book is an Act of Parliament," has fallen into disfavour, but no one can perceive the reasons why it was so firmly rooted in his mind and condemn it as lacking either in religious imagination or practical fruitfulness.

In order to preserve the plan of the earlier volume, Mrs. Barnett has included several papers from her own pen. Among them is the delightful essay on "The Children's Country Holiday Fund," which appeared originally in the Cornhill Magazine. It is full of the town-child's observations on country life, of which we cannot resist giving a few examples. "Butterflies don't do much work." "Stinging nettles are a nuisance to people who have holes in their boots." "There was no strikes down there, but there was a large number of wasps." Others, like the following, may perhaps provide food for reflection for older minds. "We went to Church in the morning, and in the afternoon for a walk, as the Clergyman told us not to go to Sunday School, as he wanted us to enjoy ourselves." "I didn't have to mind no twins," this from a small boy of nine, "I think them a nuisance. I wish mother had not bought them." For other specimens from this treasury of good stories, at once so humorous and so pathetic, the reader must go to the book for himself. We can promise him some precious and stimulating hours.

TOWARDS INTERNATIONAL GOVERNMENT.

By John A. Hobson. (London, George Allen & Unwin, Ltd., 2s. 6d. net.)

It is natural that the idealist should absorb himself at the present time in schemes for avoiding future wars. The difficulty is that few people, even among those who are specially competent to do so, have either the time or the detachment of mind needful for their consideration. There is also a suspicion that they are too much in the air to arouse much interest among men and women who have to deal with facts as they are, and not as we should like them to be. It is clear already that the experience of the war will introduce a number of new factors into our consideration of social and national problems, and among them we must reckon the persistent influence of aggressive evil and active malevolence. It is here that so many idealistic schemes of social welfare or permanent peace fail to fit the facts. We are not dealing merely with men who are estranged by misunderstanding, but with those who are actively hostile to the good of others, and believe in getting their own way by violent means. A League of Peace among the peoples of Europe would not be a difficult thing to accomplish if their hearts were set on peace. To put the matter quite bluntly the placid optimism about human nature, which has marked social theory in recent years, has received a staggering blow. We are once again face to face with the devil and all his works. No doubt Mr. Hobson recognises this, though we think that he exaggerates the practical force of the international mind and its humane intentions. The division between ambitious rulers and peace-loving peoples is not as clear as some political thinkers would have us suppose. On the other hand, he admits quite frankly that any League of Peace must ultimately rest on force, and must have the power to make its decisions effective against any nation that refuses to be bound by them. He is not an abstract pacifist. His desire is to substitute international for national employment of force. He refuses to recognise any absolute antagonism between moral and physical force. "There is no display of moral force in any act of human conduct," he says, "which does not make some use of physical force as its instrument. Such force is, in itself, no remedy, but it is a factor in every remedy which the intellect and conscience of men are able to devise. There is no purely moral suasion, no absolutely spiritual government." Here we are in close agreement with him. It is the aim of good men "to reduce the proportion of the physically coercive element in all control," though it is never likely to disappear. Mr. Hobson has given us an acute and original essay on what, as a political idealist, he considers desirable, though he is clearly under few illusions about what may be feasible at the end of the war. But it will not do for any of us to forget that our own hopes and desires will have some influence, as moral factors, in the settlement.

LIFE OF JOHN VIRIAMU JONES. By Katharine Viriamu Jones. (London, Smith, Elder & Co.)

In the 'Life of John Viriamu Jones' his widow has given us a full-length portrait of the man and his work. The two were inseparable, and his biography is in effect a chapter in the history of higher education in Wales. For this reason it will make its chief appeal to his own countrymen, who cherish his name for the singular devotion with which he gave himself and his eminent gifts in their service. He was the son of Thomas Jones, the poet preacher and friend of Browning. After leaving Oxford he held the post of Principal of Firth College, Sheffield, for a short time before his appointment as the first Head of the new University College at Cardiff in 1883. The whole success of the new venture seemed to depend upon the capacity of the young man of 27, and some felt that larger experience was needed for the post. But no appointment could have been more richly justified. He created the College out of almost nothing, and he did it not by brilliant lecturing, but by an attention to detail which never flagged, combined with rare gifts of personal sympathy and patriotic ardour. When he died at the early age of 45 he had stamped himself indelibly upon the institution. The book is necessarily full of details which can hardly be expected to interest the reader except for their cumulative effect in creating an impression of the patient enthusiasm and the strength of will needful to cope with them. But the personality of the young Principal was never obscured by his surroundings, even when his work can best be described as drudging. Through it all his happy temperament, his gift for friendship and the deep sources of enjoyment in his own mind were conspicuous. The record of his official labours is relieved with affectionate letters from his friends, and pleasant glimpses of him in his holiday moods. He always felt that he was a man of the people, and the people gave him their hearts. Mrs. Jones tells us that when the long funeral procession paused in the streets of Cardiff his youngest brother heard a workman ask his mate, "Who's this we're waitin' for?" "Don't you know?" was the answer. "It's him as cared for us."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital is one of M. Vanderelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depots for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

THE new Session of Manchester College opened this week with ten students in residence at Oxford. Three other men would have entered on their theological course but for absence on war service, and one of the tutors is also away, now Capt. Macrae of the Cameron Highlanders. Of the students, Lieut. Mansfield Evans is at the front with the Lancashire Fusiliers, Lieut. Arundel has joined the Army Ordnance Corps, and Mr. Gerrard is with the Red-Cross in France doing search work for the wounded and missing. Miss Crook, who was in France with a Friends' Relief Unit, is back for the present term, but expects to go out again. Of undergraduates attached to the College, Mr. McGee is a lieutenant in the 10th South Lanes. Battalion, Mr. Victor Fox has joined the R.A.M.C., and Mr. Wallace Tavener is giving a year to munitions work.

On Sunday, the Principal, Dr. Jacks, preached in the College chapel, and the Rev. Henry Gow conducted the Communion Service. The new liturgy is now in regular use.

On Monday afternoon, Dr. Jacks gave the opening address to the students. Speaking at the outset of the principles and traditions of the College, which he recognised that in his office of Principal he was set to maintain, he said that there could be no doubt as to what they were. It was sufficient to recall the names of the three most recent of his predecessors, Carpenter, Drummond, and Martineau, and their well known and classic utterances which were entirely consistent with earlier statements going back to the very foundation of the College, to see that its principles were clear and incontestable. It was when they came to the application of principle that their difficulties began. There were three forms in which the aims of the College had been defined. There was the dedication over the entrance, "To Truth, to Liberty, to Religion"; there was the statement of the prospectus that their work was to prepare men for the ministry of religion; and there was the well-known formula that the College was devoted to free teaching and free learning in theology. Theology they knew was the interpretation of religion. It was religion to which liberty and truth must be applied. Thus, religion was the essential thing, and they must know what it was. There were some queer things which called themselves religion which they could not possibly recognise as such, insane and abominable cults which he would not even name, the adherents of which were not likely to come to their College. But there were less strange aberrations which might visit them as they had done in the past. Were they to receive in that place mere novelties and eccentricities of thought? They must not be guided by any hard-and-fast definition but by an interpretation of religion, broad and sympathetic, such as they found in the tradition of the College. Up to 1860 what the College understood by religion was clearly always some form of Christianity broadening into universal Theism. Then between 1860 and 1886 there came a change. The claims of the great non-Christian religions had come up for consideration; but there was no change in the insistence on the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God. There was always that essentially Christian note, and so it remained to this time. To them religion was not worship of the Superman, or the eternal feminine, or the Will to Power, nor merely economic reform. And what the tradition of the College declared to them was attested also by their buildings. It was a momentous step that was taken in the building of the College chapel. So it was declared that they worshipped God. In the windows they saw the forms of angels chanting the Creator's praises, and among the prophets and apostles in the central place was the form of Christ as the Good Shepherd. There they saw what the College meant by religion, and to those other eccentric cults they must say, "You do not belong to the ethos of this place." In determining the work the College has to do they must give due weight to the chapel, for they were preparing men for the ministry of religion. The meaning of truth and liberty might be determined in the lecture-room and library, but for religion they must go to the chapel. It was vital and essential to the College, and from it library and lecture-room gained the deepest part of their meaning.

The war, Dr. Jacks said in conclusion, is going to leave a deep mark on this College as upon everything else which is in the least sensitive to spiritual experience. When the present awful tragedy has come to its issue we shall all have been purified by suffering. Nothing will be as it was. A new demand will be made on the College, and most insistent on that part of which the College chapel is the symbol and the reminder.

The address met with a very warm response from the students and friends of the College who were present. We understand that it is to be printed at once for wide distribution, especially among the churches served by the College in the training of their ministers.

In the present term the Principal is lecturing on 'The Problems of Religion,' Mr. Simpson on 'The Devotional Literature of the Old Testament,' Mr. Gow on 'The Fourth Gospel' and 'Early Church History,' and Mr. J. A. Smith, the Hibbert lecturer in metaphysics, on 'The Nature of Spirit and its Life.'

OUR MEN AT THE FRONT.

IN reply to the letter of sympathy and good cheer sent by the President of the National Conference to the men from our Churches and Sunday Schools at the front a number of answers have been received expressing gratitude for such an encouraging and appreciative message.

It may interest our readers if we give a few extracts from a few out of the many letters received. Names and addresses are not given for obvious reasons.

A., now recovering from wounds, writes :—

"I am delighted to have such a charming letter from you on behalf of the National Conference. It is cheering to one to know that we are so well thought of by our friends at home, and I assure you that I shall keep my letter as a token of friendship so long as I am allowed to remain on this earth. At present I am staying in — until such time as the doctor says I am fit to proceed on active service again. I was in France from August 17, 1914, so I can safely say I have had my share of the good things which are usually found at the front. I was sent home in June this year with appendicitis, gas poisoning, and wounded in both legs—which happily are not serious. I was in hospital seven weeks, and then allowed to go home to my wife and baby whom I had not seen since the war broke out. I came back here in August and am now waiting until I am marked fit."

B., a member of one of our Lancashire churches until three years ago, when he went to New Zealand, writes from the Dardanelles :—

"Just a line of grateful thanks for the kind message which you and your colleagues of the National Conference have issued to the men of our churches at the war. I think I can honestly say I have done my duty faithfully since I joined the New Zealand forces. If any of your young people would like to correspond with me I think I could send them one or two interesting letters. I am only a young fellow and I get very few letters.

(If any of our young people would like to respond to this invitation we shall be glad to give them the writer's name and address.)

C., after expressing gratitude for the message, writes :—

"Though personally I am not in the firing line but employed at the base, the feeling that our churches at home are one with us out here is very gratifying. We do believe that we are fighting on the side of Right and Justice, and try to see in the turmoil of the war the golden vein of God's purpose for his creatures."

D., a gunner at the Dardanelles :—

"It is, indeed, a great surprise and a greater pleasure to receive and read such a grand letter sent to me by the Conference. It is a great comfort to us soldiers to know that even when we are unsuccessful, or are victorious, our country folk are proud of us. I am so pleased to know that my old church has not forgotten me."

G., who has not yet gone to the front, but is in a Surrey company waiting for the order to march :—

"I have read your kind letter with great interest, and I am sure it is most pleasing, not only to me but to several of my fellow-comrades who are here. The reason I enlisted was this :—When at school I remember reading Tennyson's poem called 'The Revenge.' Well, on a Sunday night last November I went to a war sacred concert after service was over at our chapel, and when I came out certain parts of that poem seemed to run through my mind, and the following words said by Sir Richard Grenville just before his death, 'I have only done my duty as a man is bound to do, and with a great and joyful spirit I, Richard Grenville, die.' And so I with a great and joyful spirit went to answer my country's call to defend those I love dearly at my Sunday School and church."

F., in a Welsh camp :—

"I send you a few lines in grateful recognition of the beautiful letter I have received from the National Conference, bearing the President's name. I can assure you it is very helpful and encouraging to know that our brothers in religion and our friends at home are thinking of us and praying for us. I assure you that we are striving in our humble fashion to be true soldiers of our King and of Jesus Christ, and I trust that when the hour of danger is present and we face our country's foe, we will bring discredit on neither, but will fight for our country and for civilisation and freedom with true courage and strength given by God Almighty."

G., somewhere in France :—

"Thank you very much for the expressions of goodwill and sympathy. I did not think I, as a humble member of our church, was so much in the thoughts of others outside my own family circle. Being out here has proved to me that I have friends I did not know I possessed."

H., in Flanders :—

"Please convey to the National Conference my very best thanks for their kind, encouraging, and uplifting message. . . . What I am doing is nothing short of my duty, and needs no praise, though I admit a little helps one to bear the sacrifice one has made. I pray that our Heavenly Father will give me sufficient strength of will and purpose to enable me to face the future dangers. God bless you all, dear friends."

I., at Rouen :—

"I have only done what I conceived to be my duty in the present crisis, and it is good to have a message of such sympathy and good cheer as you have sent me. As one of the throng that are attempting to serve their King and country as far as in them lies I do return hearty thanks to the Conference for their good wishes, conveyed to me in such noble terms. I trust that this fearful conflagration will speedily come to an end that will testify to the everlasting truth of the saying 'Right and truth must ever prevail over might and wrong.'"

J., at the front :—

"Your letter did me a lot of good. I do miss my Sundays at work with the children at the Sunday School."

K., at the front :—

"Thank you for your cheering letter which I received the day after I came out of a big fight. I am very pleased that you do not forget us while we are here. I have seen some awful sights lately, and I hope people will not forget those that are dependent on these poor chaps that have got killed out here."

L., from the base :—

"Please accept my deep gratitude for your letter. We all know what we are up against, but so long as I and others know that we are thought of at home you can rely on us not to become down-hearted. The spirit of every man-jack of us here is of the best. . . . You would be surprised to know how many of the fellows welcome a minister. The Y.M.C.A. has done yeoman's service among the troops. I don't know whether you have ever heard a crowd of soldiers singing; it's fine, although some of the hymns to my ears are strange."

MINISTERS AND THE ARMY.

DECISION OF THE REV. R. NICOL CROSS.

IT is with pride and pleasure that we announce that the Rev. R. Nicol Cross, M.A., Minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, has decided to enlist in the R.A.M.C. He takes with him the gratitude and admiration of numerous friends in various parts of the country. His decision has been heartily and unanimously approved by his congregation.

A meeting of the congregation was held in the Priestley Hall, after morning service on October 17, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, J.P. (Chairman of the Chapel Committee) presiding over a large attendance. The object of the meeting was to consider the request of Mr. Cross for leave of absence for the duration of the war to enable him to join the R.A.M.C. Mr. Talbot said that, personally, he agreed with Mr. Cross that it was his duty to serve the nation in the way he felt he could. It was a sacrifice for them, but a greater sacrifice for Mr. Cross, and a still greater one for Mrs. Cross. The committee would have to do its best to provide for Mr. Cross's absence, and they must not, whatever else they did, fill his place temporarily by a younger man. He had no doubt that they would have comparatively little trouble in securing a suitable elder man or men. It was possible, of course, that Mr. Cross would never return to fill his place, and, though they all hoped that he would be spared, the congregation would make such provision as it could for that contingency. Mr. Cross did not wish to retain the whole of his salary during his absence, and arrangements under that head would be made at a later date. During Mr. Cross's absence they would come to Mill Hill Chapel just the same; to show that they came to it as a place of worship, and to pray, as Mr. Cross had told them in his beautiful sermon that morning. He moved that Mr. Cross's request be granted. Mr. H. Hirsch seconded. Mr. O. Lupton asked why Mr. Cross did not offer his services as a chaplain. The chairman said he had already discussed the point with Mr. Cross, who said that, as a Unitarian, it was impossible for him to get such an appointment. On the suggestion of Miss L. M. Passavant, it was decided to add to the resolution—which was carried unanimously—an expression of the pride which the congregation felt at Mr. Cross's action, coupled with the hope of his safe return.

It may be added that Mr. Cross makes the sixty-sixth man from Mill Hill Chapel and Schools to join His Majesty's Forces.

LOCAL PRESS COMMENT.

THE Rev. Robert Nicol Cross, the minister of Mill Hill Unitarian Chapel, Leeds, has made his choice between the pulpit and service on the battlefield, and has informed his congregation of his intention to join the Royal Army Medical Corps. At a special meeting of the congregation, after morning service, a resolution was passed releasing him for the period of the war, and wishing him God-speed.

In joining the Medical Corps Mr. Cross will, of course, have to serve as a ranker, having no medical qualifications to entitle him to a commission. It is work, however, which appeals to him.

"The tremendous issues which hang upon this war have decided me," he told a Mercury representative. "The freedom of nations and, indeed, the whole future of Europe, depend upon the outcome of this struggle, and every one who can be spared should go. I want to do my bit with the rest, and I feel that I cannot stand aside. It will be a 'great adventure,' and I do not want to be out of it."

"No," replied Mr. Cross, in answer to a question, "I don't know that I would have any objection to serving in a combatant corps. If I knew a German intended to kill me, I should certainly want to kill him first, and I think that is what the present struggle resolves itself into. But the work of caring for the suffering appeals especially to me, and therefore I have decided to join the Medical Corps."

Mr. Cross, who is a comparatively young man, has a wife and two children—a fact which lends particular weight to his remark, "If my action induces any other men here to join—and there are still many who ought to go—it will have served a good purpose."

Mr. Cross succeeded the Rev. Charles Hargrove at Mill Hill Chapel in November, 1913. A native of Hamilton, near Glasgow, he graduated at Glasgow University with first-class honours in Philosophy, and was awarded a gold medal for being the most distinguished student of the year. A short sojourn in Germany followed, and then he went to Manchester New College, Oxford. Before coming to Leeds he held pastorates in Kensington and Manchester. Since coming to Leeds Mr. Cross has published two books—'Socrates, the Man and his Mission,' and 'The Communion of Man with God,' a modern exposition of religion in history and life.

Mr. Cross will probably make his final appearance in the pulpit at Mill Hill—until the war is over—next Sunday.

He is not the first minister in Leeds to join the Forces. When the Leeds "Pals" Battalion was formed it included two Baptist ministers in its ranks.—Leeds Mercury, October 18th.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

OWING to circumstances peculiar to the present time, a slight alteration has been made in the programme of the National Conference Meetings. Professor Gilbert Murray's address on "Ethical Problems of the War" will now be given at 6 o'clock on Wednesday, October 27th, instead of 8 o'clock. We hope this will ensure the presence of a larger audience than might have been the case if the original arrangement had been carried out.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The annual Sunday school sermons were preached on Sunday last, morning, afternoon and evening, by the Rev. N. J. Hawthorn Jones, whose subjects were: 'Youth and After,' 'Universal Honour,' and 'The Structure of Moral Manhood.' Delightful singing was rendered by the choir. A much larger gathering than usual assembled in the afternoon to witness the unveiling of a Roll of Honour by Col. J. W. Pollitt, V.D., J.P., who, in a telling speech, bore tribute to the boys who had joined His Majesty's forces. At the close, the people flocked to examine the Roll, which is the work of Mr. C. A. Williams, the school secretary. The Roll will be hung in a suitable place as a permanent memorial.

Blackpool, South Shore.—At the Harvest Festival Services which were held on October 3 at the Unitarian Free Church, the sermons were preached by the newly-appointed minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable. On Wednesday, October 13 a meeting was held in the church to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Constable, presided over by Mr. S. Crompton, who was supported by the Revs. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury; J. H. Short, of North Shore; J. Crossley, of Ansdell; and B. C. Constable; Messrs. J. Cunliffe, J. M. Taylor (Treasurer and Secretary of the church), Mr. T. Hamer, of Tyldesley, and Mr. Clay, of North Shore. Letters of apology for absence were read from Mr. David Healey, Treasurer of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, and the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. Mr. Cunliffe gave the welcome on behalf of the congregation, Mr. Short and Mr. Crossley on behalf of the ministers of the district, and Mr. Evans, as one of its Secretaries, on behalf of the N. and E. Lancashire Mission, with which the church is connected. Mr. Constable, in thanking the speakers for their cordial words, said he would make no great promises, but would simply try his best to do his duty, and help them to live happy, useful lives. During the evening musical items were given by Miss A. Pollard, Miss Crain, Mr. C. N. Pollard, and Mr. J. J. Bowles.

Bootle, Liverpool.—By way of appreciative recognition of the thirty-seven adherents of the Bootle Free Church who have joined the Forces, a tastefully illuminated Roll of Honour was unveiled during the course of the evening service last Sunday, October 17th. After the sermon, preached by the minister, the Rev. Walter Short, the Chairman of the congregation, Mr. Robert Dibble, in a brief address, called upon the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, Minister Emeritus, to unveil the Roll of Honour, in recognition of the valour and patriotism of thirty-six men and one woman. Mr. Hawkes said that he had known from boyhood more than half of the soldiers and sailors mentioned, and had baptised many of them. The Roll represented an untold amount of sorrow and tears, and also an amount of honourable feeling in the homes. They prayed that those whose names were inscribed on it might be kept chivalrous and brave, that they might return with a deeper sense of the value of life, and that the rest of their days might be glorified with the idea that they had been called upon to maintain life at a higher level. The present time, Mr. Hawkes added, was a challenge to all the churches. He had all his life been an advocate of peace, but now he wholeheartedly believed that they were doing God's will, and that these men were participating in the greatest crusade the world has ever seen. A tribute was also paid to Sister Martha Moir and the R.A.M.C.

Burnley.—A musical afternoon promoted by the Adult Class of Trafalgar Street Sunday School was held on Sunday last. The programme included songs by Miss Jennie Grey, 'Cello Solos by Master Fred Robinson, violin solos by Miss Mabel Mackie, and recitals by Miss Blanche Mackie. Mr. J. S. Mackie, leader of the class, was in the chair. A collection, amounting to £1 17s. was taken on behalf of THE INQUIRER Fund for Belgian Hospitals in France. The Chairman made an earnest appeal for help for the fund, reading extracts from reports in THE INQUIRER.

Carmarthen.—The South Wales Unitarian Advisory Committee at a meeting held at Carmarthen on October 11, 1915, acceded to the request for recognition as a Unitarian minister from the Rev. D. Conwill Evans, until recently a missionary assistant in connection with the United Free Church of Scotland at Paisley. Mr. Evans had previously applied for a commission in the army for the duration of the war, and before the Committee met his application had been granted and he was posted as a second-lieutenant to the 9th Reserve Batt. South Wales Borderers. These facts were submitted to the Committee, but it was felt that religious fellowship should not be denied him on account of his inability to take up the active work of the ministry until the war was over.

Prof. Moore writes as follows in regard to the re-opening of Park-y-Velvet Chapel, some account of which appeared in these columns last week: "The restorations were designed with generous kindness by Mr. Ronald Jones, M.A., and have been carried out with the greatest personal interest and skill by the local joiner and builder, Mr. David Harries, and the decorators, Messrs. D. Jones & Sons, and the result is an interior of joy and charm, which two of the best known of the local architects have declared independently to be the most pleasing and successful in the town. Gratitude is felt also towards Messrs. Geo. Morgan & Son, architects, Carmarthen, who in the most friendly and generous spirit have allowed themselves to be consulted gratuitously on any matter connected with the execution of Mr. Ronald Jones's designs requiring local knowledge, and have kept a watchful eye upon the work throughout. Unfortunately, owing to various causes which could neither be foreseen nor avoided, the cost has considerably exceeded the amount originally contemplated, and a determined effort will be required to clear or reduce the deficit. Donations may be sent to Prof. Philemon Moore, Wellfield Road, Carmarthen.

Downpatrick.—The Rev. M. S. Dunbar has intimated his intention of resigning the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Non-Subscribing Church at the close of the year.

Glossop.—The Annual Meeting of the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union was held at the Unitarian Church on Saturday, Oct. 17, and was attended by about eighty teachers and friends. The Committee meeting was presided over by the retiring President, the Rev. H. E. Perry. At the evening meeting the new President, Mr. Frank Hepworth, was in the chair. The Annual Report and Financial Statement were read and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year were elected. A vote of thanks to Mr. S. Ashworth for his services as Hon. Treasurer over a period of fourteen years was passed, and Mr. J. E. Williamson was appointed Treasurer. The Rev. Albert Thornhill, M.A., was elected Vice-President. A paper on 'The Potentiality of Child Life' was given by the Rev. Jos. Wilson.

Idle.—A meeting was held on Saturday, October 9 at the Unitarian School to welcome the Rev. W. R. Shanks, who has accepted the position of minister at Idle and West Bowling. Mr. John Hargreaves (Bradford), presided, and a number of letters were read from friends who were unable to be present, including the Rev. W. H. Eastlake (formerly of Idle), Dr. S. Moore (Holbeck), and Mr. T. Edmund Harvey, M.P. for West Leeds, who expressed the most cordial appreciation of all that Mr. Shanks had done by his presence and example to stimulate the religious and civic life in West Leeds. Mr. H. Ellison spoke with much hopefulness of the future of the church, and Mr. C. Pearson, representing the Young Men's Class connected with the Holbeck Unitarian Church, from which Mr. Shanks has just come, paid the latter warm tribute for the work he had done there. Speeches were also made by Miss Slater, Mr. J. Tempest, Mr. Smith Thornton, and Mrs. Hempall, among others. Mr. Shanks responded in suitable terms, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mrs. Shanks, closed the proceedings.

Ilford Unitarian Church.—It is exactly six years since the foundation stones of the Unitarian Church in High Road, Ilford, were laid by Lady Durning Lawrence (on behalf of Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence), and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and the anniversary on Sunday last was marked by large attendances. The event was not publicly advertised, the members being more than sufficient to fill the building, which awaits enlargement till the war is over. The special preacher was the Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth, of Highgate. The morning service was followed by a short and impressive service of dedication, when several new members were admitted to the fellowship roll, and publicly gave the promise to be true to the principles of freedom in the search for truth, of devotion to God in the service of man, and of loyalty to the leadership of Jesus Christ. The sermon in the evening was based upon the words, "The light of the world... the salt of the earth." Special music was rendered by the choir, with Mr. Gibbs at the organ. In the afternoon there was a children's service, and Miss Dorothy Sver sang a solo. Prayer was offered at the evening service for the relatives of the late Mrs. Attack, who on the previous night had passed on to the higher life. She was a regular worshipper at the church until recently, when the infirmities of age compelled her to relinquish the privilege which she valued highly. She was one of the original members who helped to found the community nearly ten years ago, and was greatly beloved by all who knew her.

Lay Preachers' Union.—The fifth annual meeting of the Lay Preachers' Union of London and the South-Eastern Counties was held at 7.30 at Essex Hall, on Tuesday, October 12th, the President, Mr. John Kinsman, in the chair. Letters of regret for inability to attend were read from Miss Fitzsimmons and Messrs. Kittle, Sharpe, Viney, Marshall, and Dr. Tyssen. The adoption of the Report and the Treasurer's statement, which were read by the Secretary, Mr. S. D. Greenfield, was moved by Mr. Carlier, and carried unanimously. The Rev. J. A. Pearson proposed that the President and Secretary be asked to continue their respective posts for the second year, to which Mr. John Kinsman and Mr. Greenfield responded. It was suggested by the Rev. W. H. Drummond that the Secretary be instructed to convey hearty greetings to two of the Union's members, Messrs. V. Fox and A. G. Tarrant, B.Sc., who are serving in the Army, the former as a member of the R.A.M.C. An address on 'Understandable Preaching' was subsequently given by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall of Essex Church. As the result of the ballot for members of the Committee the following were elected: Miss Francis, and Messrs. E. S. Carlier, F. Colcott, E. R. Fyson, J. W. Peterken, F. W. Ross and B. Viney.

Manchester, Blackley.—On Saturday, October 16 a successful Sale of Work was held at the Unitarian Chapel. Mr. T. E. Taylor, Platt Chapel, a former member of the congregation, a descendant of the Mr. Taylor who opened the first Unitarian chapel in Blackley in the seventeenth century, performed the opening ceremony. The chair was occupied by Mr. W. Duncan, Hale, another former member, and for some years Treasurer of the church. The sum of £65 was realised.

Manchester District Association.—The autumnal meetings of the Association in preparation for the winter session were held on Saturday, October 9th. Special notices of the meetings had been circulated in the district churches and the attendance was well above that of recent years. The Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., conducted a Service of Intercession and Consecration in Cross Street Chapel at 3.30. Varying the usual order, Mr. Whitaker gave his address at the beginning of the service, making it introductory to and explanatory of the devotional exercises which followed. Two things were required, Mr. Whitaker said, if our churches were to take their proper part in the days which were approaching after the war: (1) the personalising of religion—the practice of the presence of God as the general rule and not the exception; (2) a passion for the salvation of souls must be cultivated in face of the sadness of human life under cover of much frivolity. After tea in the Memorial Hall at 4.45 the evening meeting was commenced at 5.30 and terminated soon after 7.0. The President of the Association, the Rev. J. Morley Mills, was in the chair and earnest and thoughtful speeches were made by the Rev. Irvine Lister (Warrington) and Mr. G. G. Armstrong, the former speaking on 'The Opportunity of the Present Hour' and the latter on 'Our Church Membership and Its Significance for To-day.' The war, Mr. Lister said, emphasised our problem of religion in social life. The task of our churches included the checking of the pessimistic wave passing over society, the combating of false doctrines and ideas, the demonstrating of our faith in the future of the race and the upholding of true religion. Mr. Armstrong urged that the war magnified the importance of our religious services. People were greatly divided in their attitude towards the war. In the churches they had to ask God's blessing on their choice and methods, and their task lay in helping forward the work of reconstruction. It would be well to recall what church membership had meant for us in happier times when a little more faithfulness might have made all the difference in the course of events. Thanks to the preacher and speakers, and to the choir and organist of Altrincham Church for their services, brought the proceedings to a conclusion.

North Midland Churches Roll of Honour.—In addition to the number given in our issue last week of members of the North Midland churches who have joined the Forces, we have received the names of eight others belonging to the Domestic Mission, Leicester. The following is an analysis of the complete total: Infantry, 203; Artillery, 27; Mounted, 24; Engineers, 22. A.S.C., 9; R.A.M.C., &c., 26; Air Service, 3; Cyclists, 5; Navy (or Marines), 22; Lieut.-Col., 1; Majors, 3; Captains, 7; Lieuts. (and Second-Lieuts.), 25; Col. and Staff Serjeants, 7; Non. Coms., 55; Petty Officers in Navy, 4. October 12th-15th Killed in action, 7; Ministers' sons, 5; Total names, 342.

Sunderland.—At the opening meeting of the Literary and Social Union in connection with the Unitarian church on Wednesday, October 13th, a presentation was made to Mr. William Stephenson, who is in charge of the church, and Mrs. Stephenson, on the occasion of their marriage, by Mr. J. G. Kay, President of the Congregation.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The words addressed by President Lincoln to a deputation which waited upon him to draw attention to the errors of the Administration during the American Civil War, are not inappropriate at the present time. "Gentlemen," he said, "suppose all the property you were worth was in gold, and you had put it in the hands of Blondin to carry across the Niagara River on a rope, would you shake the cable, or keep shouting out to him, 'Blondin, stand up a little straighter, go a little faster, lean a little more to the north'? No, you would hold your breath, as well as your tongue, and keep your hands off until he was safe over. The Government are carrying an immense weight. Untold treasures are in their hands. They are doing the very best they can. Don't badger them. Keep silence, and we'll get you safe over."

THE "LAZY NIGGER."

The late Mr. John Holt was no believer in the "lazy nigger" theory. "It was his daily custom," says the writer of an appreciation in The Anti-Slavery Reporter, "to cross the Mersey every morning to business in Liverpool, and as he passed a certain spot at the entrance to Water Street, he would frequently pause for a few minutes and watch the lumbering lorries as in endless stream they poured up from the docks; lorries with tons of timber, lorries with bales of cotton, lorries with huge hogsheads of oil, lorries laden high with bags of kernels; and as he paused he would say, sometimes in flashing indignation, sometimes in biting sarcasm—'And yet there are still fools who prate of the lazy nigger.' This attitude towards the African was the more convincing because for years John Holt had lived amongst the natives; he knew the forests from which, by prodigious hand labour, they brought their mahogany logs, he had seen their patient methods of extracting rubber, he had watched with amused interest the old grannie as she cracked her palm nuts and extracted the kernels, he had paddled with them up and down their mighty rivers, he had shared their huts, their wails of sadness, their songs of joy, and even their meals. What wonder then that John Holt so perfectly understood African nature, and, knowing it, loved the African as few have done or can do."

"ALWAYS IN THE TRENCHES."

How many people, we wonder, who read the lengthy casualty lists in our newspapers, realise what a large toll of life industry also takes year by year. The facts which Mr. John Robertson, of Lanarkshire, gave before the Miners' Federation in Nottingham in respect of casualties among colliers—the lads, as he reminded his hearers who were "always in the trenches"—will serve to show that commercial as well as military necessities involve a great sacrifice of human material. During the fifteen years that have passed since the South African War, 22,000 miners alone have been killed, and more than three millions have been injured seriously enough to incapacitate them from work for seven days or more. Last year, out of a total of 800,000 employed underground, 165,000 were incapacitated for seven days or more through accidents. Among the resolutions discussed at Nottingham was a request from South Wales that a thorough inquiry should be made into the effect of stone-dusting in mines. The process of stone-dusting for the purpose of rendering coal dust non-combustible is apparently not without injurious effects on the health of the miners, and some of the speakers went so far as to suggest that the remedy was worse than the disease, and that the miners are paying for an attempt to secure safety against explosions in an increased liability to phthisis.

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

Sir Edward Clarke has dealt gently in a letter to The Times with the innocent vanity of people living in small streets who give fancy names to their houses, but he suggests that they should be made to pay for indulging it to the extent of £1 a year. The cost of the postal service is increased, and the delivery of letters hindered, he points out, by the desire of dwellers in residential districts to see "The Dovecot" or "Claremont" over their door instead of a plain number, and it is his opinion that a considerable revenue would be received if the suggested tax were imposed. We doubt whether, in these hard times, many people—especially the owners of those small houses which are usually known by the grandest names—would pay £1 a year for the privilege of putting a modest "Ivy Villa" or "Park View" at the top of their notepaper. Pretentiousness is hard to kill, but when money is scarce it has to go the way of all other senseless luxuries. Perhaps the comments to which Sir Edward Clarke's letter is sure to give rise, at least in quarters where The Times is taken, may, however, lead some dwellers in the suburbs to voluntarily lighten the labours of the postman by adopting a number instead of a name, as is done in more "aristocratic" neighbourhoods.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

We have returned from France with a fund of fresh information about the needs of the Belgian Hospitals and a stronger desire, if, indeed, that be possible, to help them to the utmost of our power. We cannot give a detailed account of what we have seen this week owing to the pressure on our space. Moreover, that is a task which we prefer to leave to Mrs. Allen when she returns. Meanwhile, we may gather together a few hasty impressions and point out some of the more urgent needs. The district visited was a new one, but we found some old friends among the doctors who had been moved on to new posts of duty, and were anxiously hoping that we should soon appear on the scene. Everywhere we were received with the utmost cordiality. Personal relations were established and the local knowledge was gained which have been the secret of the usefulness of the Fund from the beginning.

THE first thing we want to say in this connection is that our Belgian friends know how to help themselves. They are not sitting down under their misfortunes or waiting for other people to come to their aid. They are facing their new and trying conditions with magnificent courage and resource. The Belgian Army has been refitted. It is no secret that it is now stronger and better equipped than at the beginning of the war. Large numbers of young men have joined the colours. We have watched them as they saluted their flag and marched off cheering for the front to win back the liberties of their country or perish in the attempt. These men are the martyrs of freedom, and they are fighting the forces of evil arrayed against them with unconquerable faith.

LESS than a week ago we visited two military industrial schools which have been established to provide a temporary asylum for hundreds of disabled Belgian soldiers, and to teach them a trade. The whole scheme has been admirably conceived and carried through with an ingenuity and capacity which have vanquished most of the difficulties of slender financial resources. These two large camps consist of wooden buildings, dormitories, officers quarters, domestic offices, and a whole series of workshops. Here skilled teachers are at work teaching the rudiments of education, type-writing, drawing and design, brush-making, carpentry, tailoring, leather work, and the manufacture of tools, electrical apparatus, and surgical appliances. Most of the men are very quick to learn, and some of them in the course of a few weeks have already become excellent craftsmen. At one of these camps situated at an important seaport, the work is already becoming remunerative, and a larger contract for brushes has been received from the English Army. The men earn small, regular wages, but every week a proportion of their money is placed to their credit in the savings bank, so that they may have some means of starting themselves in business when the war is over. As the officer, to whose organising brain and business enterprise the whole scheme

IN the place we have just described there is no need of our help, except the help which springs from personal sympathy and unbounded admiration. On the other hand, it is a real encouragement to our own special effort to know that work of this kind is going on. It gives a new touch of brightness to the outlook and makes us deeply happy and grateful for the opportunity of standing by the side of men who are putting forth all their strength to conquer their difficulties. But the Belgian resources are, unfortunately, very scanty, and when the best and most provident use has been made of them there is still need of unlimited generosity.

A WEEK ago we visited a convalescent depot for nervous cases, for which we must do a great deal without a moment's unnecessary delay. It is situated in a country village off the main road some miles from Bayeux. In the spacious buildings of an abandoned monastery there are 200 men in every stage of physical and mental collapse. They are the wreckage of the war, a pitiable sight which no one who has seen it can ever forget. The staff consists of an able doctor and a young assistant, and three Belgian nuns. There are decent beds, but otherwise the equipment is very poor. All these men need personal care. If they are ever to be cured they must be kept happy and interested. They must be helped to beat back the dark clouds of depression which bring them to the verge of madness. It requires little imagination to realise the difficulties of the doctor in the isolated position which we have described, and the physical miseries of his patients.

Now what can we do to help? The doctor told us many details of his work. We felt that we were in presence of a man who was often baffled by insuperable difficulties but would never cease to do his best in this strange and lonely combat with the powers of darkness. He confessed he had been on the point of writing to us when the letter came announcing our arrival. A list of urgent requirements is already in hand, and will be dispatched as soon as possible. But there are some special needs which we want to ask our readers to supply. There are many men who cannot walk. They remain fretting out their lives in bed because there is no means of moving them. If only they could be wheeled up and down the long corridors or taken into the garden on a fine day there would be some hope for them of recovering from their nervous prostration. We intend to send out three or four invalid chairs in which they can be wheeled about. Can we get them second-hand as a gift? If any reader is able to help in this way we shall be glad to receive full particulars at once. Then we want gramophones for this and some other places. Everywhere there is a great desire for music, and a gramophone is the only practical way in which it can be supplied. Especially for these distressing mental cases popular songs and merry tunes are the best kind of medicine. We can do with not less than six to supply recreation for the winter. Here, again, may we ask that offers should be sent to Mrs. Allen without delay.

ONE other incident from the crowded experience of this visit must suffice. On Friday afternoon last week we found ourselves at a small seaside place on the coast of Normandy. In the annexe of an hotel close to the sea there is a convalescent depot. The men are on a fair way to recovery and many of them will probably be able to rejoin the army. The situation would be pleasant enough in the summer, but during the winter months it will be cold and dreary and very lonely. Many warm comforts will be required, and those can easily be supplied out of our store; but there is another want of an even more urgent kind. There are no arrangements for proper lighting in the building, only a few lamps sufficient to make darkness visible—that is all. Night after night the men have to go to bed in the dark. How can they be brave or even decently contented under such conditions? A supply of suitable lamps will be sent out immediately. Before we left we went into the room where the men were assembled for their evening meal. At the word of command they all stood while our own national anthem was played on a cracked piano. With full hearts we thanked them and called for cheers for their own country. "Vive la Belgique" What splendid fellows they are! What a privilege to be their friends!

SERBIA at the present moment is suffering the same fate as Belgium, only with the terrible aggravation that Bulgaria has joined hands with the hereditary foes of the Balkan peoples in order to stab her in the back, and Greece, her Ally, has failed her. There is but one heart and one mind in England about our duty to help her to the utmost of our power. We cannot, however, presume to dictate to our military experts how this is to be done, and it would be worse than folly to waste time in recriminations. The veil cannot be lifted from the problems of Balkan diplomacy at the present moment. We are not going to assume that we have failed miserably when all the time we may have done the utmost which was compatible with keeping our honour clean. Lord Lansdowne's speech in the House of Lords, and the fuller account which has just appeared of M. Venizelos recent speech in the Greek Chamber give us good ground for supposing that the crisis for Serbia has been precipitated, not by our stupidity, but by the lamentable failure of Greece to perform the duty to which she was pledged by every obligation of honour. It is clear that we had adequate reason to suppose that she intended to observe the terms of her treaty. She even asked for our co-operation. Then at the last moment the Court influence triumphed and she withdrew. Some people may say that we ought not to have trusted her at all; but even in diplomacy it is impossible to guard against all the disasters of the broken word or to eliminate the military consequences of an unforeseen betrayal.

THE news about recruiting during the past week has been excellent. In some places the wave of enthusiasm is said to resemble the first days of the war. The fine appeal of the King to the young men of the nation to oppose an enemy "who has transgressed the Laws of Nations, and changed the ordinance that binds civilised Europe together," has acted as an inspiring call in many quarters. The mingled horror and admiration aroused by the story of the execution of Miss Cavell has stirred the country to fresh loyalty and heroism. Germany is slow to learn the lesson that every act of frightfulness only creates more soldiers to compass her defeat. Nor must Lord Derby's magnetic leadership be forgotten. The methods and appeals which had grown stale with use have been replaced by others more carefully organised, in many ways more personal and direct. The country does not want compulsory service if it can meet the needs of the war promptly and adequately without it. It has no love for it for its own sake. It will be magnificent if we can achieve our end with an army of volunteers, for nothing could be a better testimony before the world of the moral strength of the nation.

THE universities have begun their second war session with sadly depleted ranks. The men of finest gifts, both in character and mind, have joined the Army; they were, indeed, the first to go. And now others who hesitated a year ago, a little uncertain about their duty, or unwilling to give up everything for the sake of the country, have followed their example. This process of emptying the colleges is likely to go on, for everything has become trivial compared with this one great duty of resisting evil and winning our security. It is announced that 23 divinity students left the Primitive Methodist College, Manchester, this week to join the R.A.M.C. We do not care to speculate about the effect on the future. There is a duty to be done, a danger to be faced, and no generous heart can hold back. It is not a time for prudent calculation but for quick and active obedience. The career does not matter, the duty does. That is all, and the great decision is taken. We used to think that the words "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," cut too deep into ordinary feeling to have any meaning for ourselves; but our young men have revealed to us their truth.

THE meetings of the National Conference in London this week have justified themselves by the contribution which they have made to the moral purpose and religious vision of the nation as a whole. The sermon by Dr. Jacks and the address by Prof. Gilbert Murray moved entirely upon this high plane. They were felt by all who listened to them to be among the great religious utterances produced by the war. In their searching moral sincerity, and the clearness with which they stated the essential factors in this world-wide conflict between good and evil, they supplied the best answer to the indecision of confused debate, or the feeble pessimism which affirms that Christianity has failed us because we are engaged with all our strength and all our hearts in a tragic struggle for justice and public right.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

It is our best happiness to stand fast for the great ideas and their accordant emotions, by whose prevalence the high progress of mankind into harmony with God's character is guided; to be true to those noble causes by whose victory man is made great, and grows still greater. The support of these ideas and causes makes a nation glorious, and, beyond the nation, adds light and life to the whole world. Stand fast for unbribable justice and its doing; for truth in business, in politics, in science, in art, literature, law, and religion; for honesty in work, for pity of the oppressed and heavy-laden, and for sacrifice of self to save them; for civil and religious feeling in the world, for the common rights and duties of all men; for the equal opportunities of all men and women, and for their full development.

Contend and labour for these high aims at home and abroad. If you only contend for them at home, only in your own work—you will lose them. They decay and die unless they are expanded. Wherever freedom struggles towards life, wherever justice meets injustice, wherever truth is striving against lies, wherever man is sorrowful—there let your sympathy flow in help, there let your protest be heard, there sacrifice yourself. That will bless, dignify, profit, develop, exalt, and inspire the future. Whether your name live or not in England and the world, your influence will.

Nor will your inner life with God, the sacred, silent religion of the soul, suffer by this; it will gain in depth and power. For this life is the very life God has sent you unto the world to live for him. This is his work you do, the saving of mankind, and he will answer your doing of it with the gift of his dearest and clearest communion. Nor will you be apart from, but always more near to, your Master Jesus. For this also was his life. Himself has said it, "For this end was I born, for this cause I came into the world to bear witness to the truth."

STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

The following Canticle and Prayer were used at the service in connection with the National Conference at Essex Church on October 26:—

WHEN my soul is in heaviness, and my heart is disquieted within me:

When darkness is round about my path, and all thy tempests go over my head:

Then will I betake me to the great congregation, to hear the psalm of thy redeemed and to cast my burden on the Lord.

Thou shalt cause me to hear of joy and gladness; the songs of the blessed shall visit me in the night.

They shall declare the might of thy spirit; they shall also make mention of thy peace:

Of love made perfect through suffering, and the rest that remaineth for the children of God.

As a cloud of witnesses they shall surround me: as ministering spirits they shall strengthen my soul.

They fought the good fight, they kept the faith: they came through great tribulation, enduring unto the end.

And now, O Lord, they rest in thy keeping: they shine as the stars for ever and ever:

That the lost may be gathered in from all nations, and thy way made known to the uttermost parts of the earth:

To such as wander in the wilderness, and to them that are afar off upon the sea.

Thou callest us into the communion of thy beloved, the glorious fellowship of the children of light:

That we may walk in the joy of thy presence, who wilt greatly refresh us with the river of thy life.

O send out thy light and thy truth, let them lead me: let them bring me to thy holy hill and to thy dwelling-place.

O draw me from out the great waters: lead me to the rock that is higher than I.

Then shall my soul return unto her rest: I shall come to the haven where I would be. Amen.

ETERNAL and ever-blessed God, who hast made us the heirs of many ages, and set us in the midst of many brethren, deepen our gratitude for thy blessings as we have received them from our fathers, our benefactors, and our friends. May we never forget the kindness which surrounds us in the present, nor be careless of the treasures we inherit from the past; but having a lively sense of our debt to the brethren and a loving remembrance of departed generations, may we reverently carry forward the work of the ages and daily endeavour, as faithful stewards, to enrich the same by a good conversation and a godly life. We thank thee for the fellowship of the living, with whom we share thy mercies and adore thy name; for partners in duty; for comrades in the good fight; for all who feel with our joys and our sorrows, and especially for those by whom we are beloved and whom we love. We also bless thy Holy Name for the labours of the men of old; for the succession of prophets, apostles, martyrs, and holy men continued even to this day; for leaders and commanders of the people who have made themselves great by becoming servants of all, and for the nameless multitude of the loyal and devoted, who have fallen asleep in their generations, leaving their memorial with thee. Make us of one heart, we beseech thee, with all these, thy worshippers; of one purpose with all these, thy servants; of one communion with all these, thy saints; and of one will with thine. Amen.

THE BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

MRS. ALLEN has written the following preliminary account of visits paid to some of the Belgian Convalescent Depôts in France at the end of last week. A fuller report will appear when she returns, but, meanwhile, she wishes to draw the immediate attention of our contributors and the members of working parties to some of our urgent needs.

On returning to this base from a four days' trip with the Editor of THE INQUIRER and Mr. Kelland among the Convalescent Depôts for the Belgian soldiers in this region, there are certain wants which it is most necessary we should supply at once, and I want to ask all the working parties and private workers to send up parcels of whatever they have of the following articles to reach my house by the end of this month (when I shall be at home again) in order to get the things out here before the winter sets in in earnest. It is already pretty cold out here, especially in the inland towns. The articles I specially want are :—

500 shirts.
500 pairs of socks.
250 vests and pants.
200 jerseys or cardigans.
1,000 pocket-handkerchiefs.
500 towels.
1,000 blankets.

This is a minimum to start with, later on we shall want these stocks replenished. We must not starve the Calais hospitals to supply these new needs. This morning I have been round the store cupboards of a depôt for 250 men. There were no socks, about a dozen cotton shirts, no slippers, three spare blankets, no vests, no pants, nor any knitted comforts, and no prospect of getting any till we arrived. If I could only get all our subscribers over here to see for themselves my house in Hampstead would be overflowing with gifts to-morrow. Of that I am sure; but as that cannot be, I can only beg them to see it through my eyes, and to send help as if they had seen it. We are getting certain essential articles of furniture such as stoves, &c., out here, as it is cheaper than sending, and the medical and surgical requirements are already in the hands of the firms who supply us. I hope to write a detailed account of all we have seen on my return, but I am now going "nearer the front" to see certain changes which have taken place recently.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF FREEDOM.

THE language of freedom is the language of the creative power by which worlds are made, the articulate speech of the divine spirit working in the universe. Freedom is at once the first thing we fight for with all the insistence of crude passion, and the last thing we achieve after long experience and discipline, when we are ready to cast it away to serve the needs of our fellow men, and to sacrifice life as well, that unborn generations may receive a precious inheritance. It is the ultimate expression of the true self, the flowering of all the faculties—physical, mental, and spiritual—which we blindly devote in the initial stages of growth to objects that often spoil and degrade human personality; and to what may it be fruitfully applied if not to the liberation of the true selves of others, and the founding of communities in which each shall have the fullest opportunity of developing the God-given powers within him? The free man is known, like the man of genius, by his over-mastering desire to share his spiritual possessions with others, and to him who has realised that through all the hindrances to progress the soul of humanity steadily reaches upwards to liberty and love, the one condition of perfect joy is that all should breathe the same spacious air and feel the same kindling emotions as himself. Some there are, of course, who mistakenly conceive of it as the will-to-power in the narrower sense, and think they are soaring like eagles while the sun melts their waxen wings of egotism and lawlessness. But the extent of their delusion is generally seen in the ineffectiveness of their lives, in the alienation from their kind which waits upon sterility of heart, in the querulous temper characteristic of the selfish and intractable spirit goaded by perpetual discontent.

This conception of freedom as the actual life-impulse working through a thousand forms is the root idea of Mr. Henry Bryan Binns's philosophy in 'The Free Spirit' (London: Messrs. A. and C. Fifield, 4s. 6d. net) a collection of verses, followed by a "Note on Personal Expression," which not only provides us with food for earnest thought, but creates an atmosphere in which the reader becomes aware of the hidden possibilities in his own soul, and the infinite riches that are to be obtained as a result of their unfolding. For Mr. Binns—and we gladly re-echo his words—it is not spring, whatsoever the day, till the brain "is a-leaf and a-flower" and the heart has grown "mightily whole." Year after year the loveliness of April and the glory of June may renew the youth of the world, but unless we are inly bathed by the all-transfusing wonder as the daffodils are bathed and irradiated by the sunshine, we are still slumber-bound in a land of winter. Joy comes to birth when the fire without kindles the spark within, and we are liberated from the cramping bonds of unawakened consciousness. Freedom is this emancipator, but it is a life, not a theory of life. "It can only be truly communicated as an inspiration, a motive force from one man to another. Hence it must be generated; it must leap into speech and song out of a free heart. Its source lies there; it can only spring from its source." Personality, therefore, is sacred, and its development the essential thing for us all, though we are not quite sure whether in speaking of this Mr. Binns distinguishes quite clearly between the man as he is known to his fellows in the transient vesture of the flesh, with tricks of speech and gesture, habits, and ideas of which we are reminded whenever his name is mentioned, and the real individuality, call it what you will—the abiding and immortal Self, of which we may only catch a glimpse once in a life-time, if at all. The one may be known—as John Smith, the other has no name whereby we can summon it into our presence out of the extended world of consciousness which it inhabits, and where it is ever seeking to bridge the gulf between the earth-born and the Source of his inmost being. But "freedom for freedom's sake" is a cry which conveys as little to the writer of this book as "art for art's sake." True liberty and self-expression are not really to be thought of as ends in themselves, but as the necessary condition—and this only to be achieved at immense cost—of our entry into the fellowship of articulate souls who are translating the divine Word syllable by syllable, and for whom the ultimate reality is God.

It is difficult to convey briefly the full significance of Mr. Binns's message, set forth as it is with so much beauty, and at the same time with such a reticence of language that the book must be read and pondered over before it yields up its secret. His conclusions are the result of long meditation in which the lyrical impulses of the poet have submitted to the quietening touch of the philosophical thinker, losing something in spontaneity, perhaps, but gaining immeasurably in depth of insight. He strives to make the reader respond to the vital thrusts of his own passionate faith, but he scorns to use popular catchwords that might make things easier for average minds, or relieve them of the travail of hard thinking. If you have no sympathy with his mood, no conception of the way in which spirit with spirit may meet in the white light of transcendent vision, you cannot easily enter the mystical society of free souls, nor can any of its members secure you admission by right of love alone. Each one must make good his own claim, though he is not left without the assistance of "divine auxiliars."

Even your strong presence cannot quite Emancipate me, nor my spirit bring Forth of its ultimate delivering— That is my own inalienable right;

a pregnant thought to turn over in the mind at the present time when so many are apt to forget that neither a nation nor an individual can have the fruits of the spirit forcibly imposed upon it from without, irrespective of the working out of its salvation from within. It is of the very essence of freedom that it should have the compelling force of a new and personal discovery, although it has followed all the normal processes of growth, and that it should reveal the meaning of life, as the lovers of their kind know it, in the glow of a consuming flame before which no false theories of domination and tyranny can stand for an instant.

Here I have been so long in exile,— (thus sings the emancipated spirit):
Beholding myself apart from every other;
Protesting, defending, identifying myself
so long against the whole world!
I who was never really separate or different Or against any—fellow of all, and here
so long apart!
But now I know within me the spirit seeking a voice
To sing in me, as in the blackbird, its starry morning song.

Thou art the spirit of all,
Shepherding all with urgent longings,
In wild Freedom, in passionate Love,
In perilous sublime Faith, urging all creatures forward—
They know not why, till they discover Thee!

Thee, O God, I discover,
I am at large, losing myself in Thee; Finding my song, as a blackbird among the boughs,
Finding my place in thee.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

SIR THOMAS BOWRING.

WE regret to announce the death of Sir T. B. Bowring, of London and Moretonhampstead, which took place at Moretonhampstead on October 17, at the age of sixty-eight. Sir Thomas Bowring was the Director of Messrs. C. T. Bowring and Co., Ltd., shipowners, of London and Liverpool. Born in Newfoundland, and educated in England, he had been engaged all his life in the shipping business. From 1870 to 1891 he represented his firm in New York, and had since resided in London. His early years were spent for the most part in the Moretonhampstead district, and when he went to reside in London he did not forget his Devonshire associations. He was an ardent supporter of the Mid-Devon Liberal Association, while at the same time exercising a broad-minded generosity to all societies, regardless of politics or creed, which sought the individual or social welfare of the people. In the children of Moreton he was always warmly interested, and many "old" boys and girls will remember him for the prizes which his liberality made it possible for them to win. Recently he founded a scholarship in connection with the Moreton schools, tenable for three years at the Newton Abbot Secondary School. Amongst the most important of his benefactions was the gift of the Free Library, which he furnished and stocked with books. He was made a Magistrate in 1906, and created a Knight in 1913. A member of the well-known family of Bowrings, of which Sir John Bowring, one of Exeter's worthies, was the head, Sir Thomas Bowring was a generous benefactor of the Unitarian Chapel at Moretonhampstead, the handsome endowments which it possesses being largely due to him and members of his family. He also built a number of workmen's cottages in the parish, and every year, in connection with the local Horticultural Society, he encouraged the cottagers by offering substantial prizes for the best tilled gardens and allotments. Probably no one knows how much he did in this way, for no one ever wrote to him on behalf of any philanthropic object without receiving a reply, and his name will be remembered with affection and gratitude by many Moreton people, now in distant parts of the Empire. The funeral took place at Moretonhampstead on October 21, at the Cross Street Unitarian Chapel. A private service was held at the house conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, his former minister at Essex Church. This was followed by a public service. There was a large attendance of sympathisers, in addition to the mourners, including the children from the Council School. The service was conducted by the Minister, the Rev. T. F. M. Brockway.

LADY TALBOT.

WIDESPREAD regret will be felt in Manchester at the death of Lady Talbot, wife of Sir William Henry Talbot, the Town Clerk of Manchester for twenty years, and now consulting solicitor to the Corporation. Lady Talbot, who was in her 80th year, passed away at her home in Woodlands Road, Cheetham Hill, on Sunday last. She was a charming lady, gentle in nature, and generous-hearted. Although she did not appear much in the public gaze, she quietly did a great deal of good, as many charitable organisations and also many individuals could tell. Especially did she take interest in those hostels which, situated near the chief railway stations of the city, shelter and care for friendless women who arrive as strangers in Manchester, and she was President of the hostel in New Bridge Street opposite the Victoria Station. A devoted wife and mother, she was deeply touched when, in 1907, on the occasion of a portrait of her husband, painted by Mr. Tom Mostyn, being handed to the Corporation, she was presented with a replica of it. The presentation was made in the Town Hall at a remarkable gathering representative of the scientific, literary, artistic, religious, legal, and business life of the city. Lady Talbot's little speech at that gathering stirred deeply the emotions of all present. "To my sons and to me," she said, "this picture is of inestimable value, because it represents to us the kind husband, the affectionate father, and the good man, for I can truly say that I have known him tried in all life's balances and not found wanting... In our life's long day together, though we have had our sad days and our bad days, we have also had our glad days, and to us both this day will ever remain one of the best of all." These words revealed what a fine woman Lady Talbot was and the large share she had had in the successful career of Sir William.

The funeral took place at the Southern Cemetery on Wednesday, and was preceded by a service at the Cross Street Chapel conducted by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas. The Manchester Corporation was represented by Sir Thomas Shann and Councillor Thewlis. The principal mourners were Sir William Henry Talbot, Mr. Edward Talbot (son), Mr. Hugo Talbot (son), Miss Kate Winsor, Mr. H. A. Winsor, Mrs. Ernest Scott, Mr. Sidney Winsor, Mrs. Julian Winsor, Mrs. Percy Winsor, Mrs. Goodwin, Miss Hibbert, Miss Mary Baker, and Miss Ethel Parry. A great many flowers were sent by friends. Mr. Albert Nicholson (past President), represented the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire Unitarian Churches.

OF UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, AND OTHER NON-SUBSCRIBING OR KINDRED CONGREGATIONS.

THE Triennial Meetings of the National Conference were held in London on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, October 26-28. It was expected that the postponement of the meetings to such a late season of the year would seriously affect the attendance, and this proved to be the case. Only about 200 ministers and delegates were present, but there was no coldness about the assembly. The sense of comradeship was intensified by common anxieties; the voice of carping criticism was silent, and more than one utterance reached a level of lofty eloquence and inspiring conviction which will last as a precious memory for many years. In the circumstances all the arrangements for hospitality were marked by quietness and simplicity, and the usual public soirée was not held.

On Tuesday afternoon a reception was held by the President and Mrs. Rathbone at Essex Hall. This was followed by a service at Essex Church. There was a large congregation which almost filled the church. The service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Craddock of Liverpool, and the Conference sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. L. P. Jacks, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

The proceedings on Wednesday opened with a Communion Service at Stamford Street Chapel, at which the officiating ministers were the Revs. Dr. Hargrove and F. K. Freeston. At 10.45 the Conference reassembled in Essex Hall to hear the President's Address. This was followed by a discussion of the Report on Public Worship, opened by the Rev. J. Wood and Dr. Mellone, and continued by the Rev. V. D. Davis, Mrs. H. D. Roberts, and the Rev. G. W. Thompson. The afternoon was occupied with the Business Meeting. At 6 o'clock Essex Hall was crowded to hear Prof. Gilbert Murray's address on 'Ethical Aspects of the War.' The time had been wisely altered, with the result that many people were present who would have been deterred by the darkness of the streets at a later hour. It is not suitable that large gatherings of people should be held in central places in London late in the evening at the present time. Of Prof. Murray's address all that need be said is this. It was one of the greatest utterances on the religious side which the war has produced. A report can give some idea of its haunting beauty of phrase, but nothing can reproduce for those who were not there the simplicity of manner, which held the whole assembly spell-bound, or the intimacy of its personal confession and appeal.

The proceedings on Thursday were opened with a Devotional Service conducted by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne. This was followed by a resumed discussion of the Report on Public Worship at which the chief speakers were Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, and the Rev. F. H. Vaughan. The latter part of the discussion was reserved for the Religious Education of the Young, which was dealt with by Miss Clephan and the Revs. J. Morley Mills and J. A. Pearson.

The local arrangements have been in the hands of a special committee, with Mrs. Sydney Martineau and Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C. as Hon. Secretaries, and Mr. Harold Wade as Treasurer.

This week we are able to give reports of the Conference Sermon, by Dr. Jacks; the President's Address, by Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone, and the Address by Prof. Gilbert Murray. We are obliged to hold over till next week the reports of the Business Meeting and the Discussion on Public Worship.

THE CONFERENCE SERMON.

BY

THE REV. DR. L. P. JACKS.

Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground.—Exodus iii. 5.

In the midst of the tremendous experience through which we are now passing all distinctions of sect, church, and creed seem to vanish. If there ever was a time when we deemed those distinctions important we can hardly do so at the present moment. What is uppermost in all our minds is not the sense of a difference from others, but the sense of a common lot. We forget, for the moment, that we are members of this church or that. We remember that we are fellow actors and fellow sufferers in the greatest tragedy the world has ever seen. We grasp the hands of invisible millions. We become members of a world-wide congregation, where all distinctions are lost in a common suffering and a common duty. In a deep and true sense the Holy Catholic Church of which many of us have dreamed is an accomplished fact. But it goes beyond our dreams and betters them. It is yet holier, larger, more catholic, more deeply based in the heart of the universe, and more richly illuminated with the light of God. It is the Church of a suffering humanity which becomes victorious through suffering. It is the Church of those who pass through great tribulations. It embraces all our brethren and fellow-countrymen, and, in the deepest sense of all, it embraces our enemies, for a broken heart is the same thing, whether it breaks in London or Berlin. To the members of that Church and to no others do I address myself to-night.

Some may have deemed it a misfortune that this Conference of Free Churches should be holding its session in the midst of circumstances so seemingly untoward. And, certainly, it would be a misfortune if this Conference were concerned merely with the sectional interests of a group of churches. Most assuredly the present moment is not a fitting time to concentrate our minds on questions that merely concern ourselves, however important those questions may be. The call of the times is that we should look beyond ourselves in every direction. But that is the very thing which the ideal of the Conference requires us to do. To parade our achievements, to indulge our corporate egotism, to magnify our self-importance and call the attention of the world to ourselves, that surely was never the aim but the very opposite of the aim of those great spirits who founded this Conference, and those devoted men who have carried on its work through so many years. They, too, have ever called us to look beyond ourselves—to cultivate wider relationships with all sections of the Church of Christ, to extend the right hand of fellowship to brethren from whom the empty shows of this world have sundered us, to open our eyes on every side that we may receive new visions of the divine excellence and new revelations of the inexhaustible truth of God. Shall we not, therefore, count it an advantage, and no drawback, that we meet at a time which compels us to rise above all sectional limitations, a time which forbids us to think only of ourselves, a time when all souls, save such as sleep the sleep of death, are merged in universal hopes and universal sorrows, a time when all churches and all nations stand side by side before the judgment seat of history, listening together to a new Word of the Lord, which speaks to us now, not as it is wont to do, in the still small voice alone, but also in the earthquake, the wind, and the fire. Let us think of ourselves to-night as thus standing together with a great host of our human brethren, which is as the sand by the sea-shore for multitude; together with them in the presence of God, who is both our Judge and our Redeemer; fellow-members with millions in the University of Sorrow; sharers with them—I do not hesitate to say it—in the common guilt of our civilisation, but sharers no less in the penitence which lifts us beyond the guilt and makes us all the children of a common Father; and above all, waiting with open eyes and responsive hearts for the dawning of the light which shall assuredly break forth when these tempests are overpast, nay, which is shining already through many a rift in the storm.

These things are a revelation of God. They reveal God to us, as history always does, by revealing man to himself. This war is unfolding before our eyes the immense scroll of human possibilities—possibilities of evil at one end, possibilities of good at the other. We stand astonished at the immeasurable distance that separates the two extremes, at the abounding variety and richness of all that lies between. At the one end we see the ferocity of the tiger, the passions of the wolf; at the other end are the divinest attributes of the Son of God. In one lightning flash, or rather in a continuous succession of them, such as we see when a thunderstorm is raging among the great mountains, we behold the Best and the Worst of which human nature is capable. What a Best! What a Worst! The Best far better than we thought it was. The Worst far worse than anything of which we imagined that human nature was capable of being guilty, and both on a scale that baffles the imagination. On the one hand millions of men and women eager to take up the Cross and give their lives as a ransom for their brethren. On the other, whole nations gone mad in wickedness, or intoxicated with their own crimes. And the two things revealed to us not one by one, but together. Not the Best to-day and the Worst to-morrow, but both at one instant, and often in the same individual. What a being is man! To what depths can he sink! To what heights can he rise! What a contrast between what he can make of himself and what God would make him! Is not that a revelation? Have not these times brought us a new vision of life at once more awful in its shadows, and more splendid in its lights, than any we had entertained before? Do we not see as never before that the powers which contend for mastery in this world are nothing less than heaven and hell?

Aye, and do we not see it also and feel it more vividly when we look into our own hearts? Who of us can look upon these things, whether in the great world or in his own heart, without finding himself instantly confronted with two tremendous truths: first, the splendour of the prize of which the Best that is in him makes him worthy, and then the appalling danger lest, through the operation of the Worst, the prize should be missed. Verily, we stand in jeopardy every hour! The march of human progress, whether you take it in the great world or in your own soul, is a perilous affair. How often in the past have we discussed together the issues that are at stake in this human life of ours, in the corporate history of our civilisation, in the private history of our own souls. Ah, yes, we have discussed the issues. But have we ever fully grasped the truth that they really are at stake? This war is showing us that they are, and it is showing us why they are. Surely that vision will have its effect on us all. Surely there is no minister of religion who will emerge from these times without feeling the need of some stronger and more loving word than he ever used before to sustain courage and faith, to quicken endeavour and deepen the hold on spiritual reality in a world where such portentous issues are really at stake.

Not many days ago a scene was enacted which brings to its sharpest focus the whole meaning of this war. Like another and greater scene, which also summed up the whole mystery of evil, this one was laid in a garden. There, in that garden of the modern city which, like Jerusalem of old, lies under the heel of the conqueror, the Best and the Worst came together to settle their controversy. For one brief, tragic, infinitely significant moment, the two extremes of the spiritual world confronted one another. The heavens are opened and their light shines on the head of the martyr woman, and at the very same instant the abyss is uncovered, and from its lowest depths there comes forth the ruthless power that slew her. As the eye lingers on the figure of that heroic woman, who can doubt that the best, the divinest thing in the world, is there before him. And when we see it thus, not as a far-off legend of 2000 years ago, but as a present reality living in our midst and very near to us, does not the best seem far better than we had ever deemed it? But when our glance passes to the other figures in that modern Gethsemane and rests for one horror-stricken moment on the slayers, as we think of the powers they represent and of which, perchance, they are the unwilling agents, does it not now seem to us that the worst things of which our human nature is capable are worse than we had ever imagined in our darkest hours? What a vision of the infinite possibilities of man in both directions! And do we not feel as we turn away from the dreadful scene, that what we have witnessed is something more than a mere contrast between the extremes of the spiritual life? It is the conflict of the two that we have seen! We have seen them measuring their strength against each other! And who can doubt that victory lay with the Best? The slain woman has conquered! The blow which the Worst dealt at the Best has recoiled, as such blows ever recoil, upon its authors, and hastened the day when the evil cause shall perish for ever. There, compressed into one illuminating moment, is the whole meaning of this war. It is a war between the two extremes of the spiritual world, not only as they exist in the high politics of nations, but also as they exist in the depths of the human heart.

Events such as this explain to us that extraordinary mingling of suffering and satisfaction, of peace and unrest, of hope and despair, of exaltation and depression of which many of us are conscious at the present time. In ordinary times grief and joy rarely come together; first we have the one, then we have the other; to-day we suffer, to-morrow we enjoy. But we are so made—and it is the greatest marvel of our nature—that at one and the same moment we can feel within us the woe of an endless suffering and the exaltation of an endless joy. There are rare occasions in life when the heights and the depths seem to mingle together, and out of their mingling to produce a third state, which is neither joy nor grief, but something richer than either, and of which we can only say when it comes to us that God is passing by. These are the most wonderful moments of life. They are the culminating points of human experience to which everything else seems to be leading on. They may occur under many conditions; but the moments when they occur most certainly and with greatest force are precisely those when the Best and the Worst are wrestling for mastery within the soul of man, within the soul of a nation, within the soul of humanity. When the Best and the Worst are locked in strife, when shame and honour are putting forth their strength together, when hate is bitterest and love most radiant, when pain is eating like a canker and joy is lifting us up on the wings of the morning, then it is that our powers and faculties are widest awake, our spiritual life at the highest pitch of its tension, our eyes opened, our ears unstopped, our conscience illuminated and all the strings of the soul responsive to the finger of God. These are the moments of our profoundest religious experience which, if their meaning is seized, will shed light on every problem and give power to every activity of truth and right.

Brethren, I affirm that such a moment has come to us. Here and now we are all passing through it, as individuals, as churches, as nations. A profound religious experience, recognised by some, unrecognised by many, but none the less real for that, is, at this very hour, stirring, uplifting, and astonishing the soul of man. "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." What though the experience be new and strange? Was there ever a religious experience that was not new and strange? What though it corresponds to none of the models of religious experience described in the books? Was there ever a religious experience that corresponded to a model described in a book? Were we not warned long ago that the Day of the Lord would come as a thief in the night, in a form which answered to nobody's expectations, and at an hour which would fall like a thunderclap on all the world? Have we ever longed for religious experience? Have we ever desired it for ourselves or for others? Have we ever said when thinking of our Church, "What this Church needs is to get out of the mist of words and phrases and come into direct contact with spiritual realities, to feel upon its soul the breath of those sublime and awful things which lie hidden in the unfathomable depths of the universe?" I answer, the hour has come! I speak not of the visible conflict alone. I speak of the invisible conflict of the Best and the Worst. Have you felt the breath of these things stirring you to the depths? Have you seen what is at stake? Has the cleansing fire passed over you? Have you gone down with your brothers and sisters into the Dark Valley? Have you freely embraced your share in the grief and the suffering, and at the same time entered with your brethren into the joy of a mighty resolution that you, for your part, will stand or fall with the Best? Here, then, is your religious experience than which none more significant, none more rich in its revelation of eternal realities will ever be vouchsafed to you though you should live for a thousand years: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet," for there is no ground holier than that on which you stand here and now.

Let us remember that this great religious experience is one through which the whole community is passing. It is an almost universal experience. That will make a profound difference to the conditions under which our work will have to be done hereafter. Our Gospel, whatever it may be, will be addressed to a world which has been illuminated and purified by a great sacrifice. The churches will have to face a new criticism which will have its origin, this time, not in the workroom of the scholar but in the shadows of Gethsemane. Hitherto we have met the criticism of the contentious intellect; when the war is over we shall have to meet more fully than ever before the criticism of the purified soul. There will be a sifting out of the chaff from the wheat, and there is no church in Christendom so privileged by the splendour of its history or so strong in the reasonableness of its principles as not to feel the effect. All that we can say with certainty is this: that if there be any Church which has entered more deeply than others into the heart of this tragedy, which has felt more keenly the mingling of its splendour and its horror, which has responded more freely to the call of duty, which has identified itself more completely with the cause of the Best, and so won a larger share in the religious experience of the time, that is the Church whose light will shine forth as the morning when these calamities are overpast. If, on the other hand, there be any Church whose soul has held aloof, which has been a mere spectator of the world's agony and a mere commentator on the heroism of others, whose conferences and congregations and colleges have sat down at a safe point of observation and watched the crucifixion of humanity from afar, merely saying to one another, "Oh! how horrible!" then I say without hesitation that hereafter the status of that Church will be lowered, its preachers less respected, its doctrines less heeded—no matter whether they rest on authority, on reason, or anything else. Pray God, there be no such Church!

There was once a suffering servant of God who died for mankind on the Cross of Calvary. He died and the world saw him no more, and when he was gone, men began to interpret the meaning of that Cross on which he had suffered. They had to work out their interpretation unassisted by his visible presence, for he was gone beyond the reach of sound and sense. The same thing will happen when the war is over; but it will happen with a difference.

Again the suffering servant is fulfilling the part which has been assigned him from the foundation of the world. On the battlefield, on the sinking ship, in the hospital, in the prisoners' camp, in thousands of homes whose inmates have been flung maimed and moaning on the shores of a horrible grief, the suffering servants of the Lord are carrying the burden of our iniquities and bearing the chastisement of our peace. And a time is coming when theologies and churches will be challenged to interpret these things and tell the world what they mean.

There are thousands of these suffering servants whom we shall never see again. They lie afar off in unremembered graves. Like their great original they are beyond the reach of sound and sense, where thousands more have yet to follow them. We shall have to interpret their lives in their absence as the men of old interpreted the absent Christ. They will not be here to assist and to guide the interpretation. So far all will be as it was of old. But there the resemblance ends. This time there will be survivors. Multitudes of suffering servants who have endured everything short of death, souls that have been purified in the fire, men and women who have seen the worst and suffered it for the sake of the best, who have borne long months of anxiety without a murmur, who have met evil in its most terrible form and kept the faith at the very gates of hell, heroes and heroines who have fought the good fight on many a cruel battlefield of the soul, and drunk deep of many a bitter cup, all these will be round about us, not in their thousands but in their millions. They will be present when the churches and the theologians tell the world what these things mean. They may even take part in the interpretation themselves. The theologians and the churches will have to look them in the face. Will not that put the wisdom of theology to the severest test? Will it not try the sincerity of the churches? Can we suppose for an instant that an experience so vast and deep will leave no mark on religion? Is it likely that this great cloud of witnesses so suddenly introduced into the world will have no influence to exercise, no word to say, no new standard to enforce of sincerity and truth? Not long ago a poor man said to me, "When my boys come back from the front, if ever they do, I want to be able to look them in the face." It struck me as a noble wish. Broaden out the words to the full extent of their meaning until they cover every form of self-sacrifice which the war has quickened into being, and what more need be said about the outlook for the churches? The outlook for the churches is that they will have to look all that in the face.

That is the ordeal—the searching ordeal—which now awaits every church in Christendom. We shall have to confront a world which has come through great tribulations. We shall find ourselves surrounded by men and women who have borne the severest trials to which human nature can be exposed, and in whose presence all doctrine will seem a mockery save that doctrine which is based on experience deep and searching as their own. We shall meet these men and women everywhere, in the streets, in public gatherings, and in the homes of our people. They will be in the pews on Sunday, and we shall have to look into their faces during the solemn ministrations of religion. They will judge us, as those have a right to judge us who have been wounded for our transgressions, and by whose stripes we are healed. Our saviours are always our judges. They will judge the sincerity of our profession, the reality of our faith. Whatever is strong and true in our message will be declared. Whatever is weak and conventional and perfunctory will be made manifest. Cold-blooded speculations on the tragedy of life will be less wanted than ever. Interpretations of Christ which are correct in every particular except that they lack his spirit will evoke no response from the great congregation of the suffering servants of God. It will be a beneficent ordeal but a severe one. It will prove too much for any Church which remained an outsider in that great day when the Best went forth to do battle with the Worst.

But we are not outsiders, and there is nothing in these tremendous times for which I thank God more deeply. We have our share in these tribulations, and if a yet greater share be allotted to us, shall we not drink the cup? From our brave men and our braver women we are learning the lesson which the service of our cause requires—the lesson of a deeper and more sympathetic humanity, the lesson of a fuller devotion to things which are infinitely more precious than life, the lesson of a spiritual unity born of common sacrifice for a common cause. God grant that we may endure to the end!

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

BY

MR. HUGH R. RATHBONE, M.A.

If I were asked what appears to be the main want in our national life to-day, I do not think that I should have much difficulty in deciding. It would certainly not be a lack of a sense of public duty. Even before the war, I was not one of those who despaired of our national life on this score, while during the last fourteen months there has been a wonderful quickening of this sense of public duty—one sees it on all sides—the men who have gone to the front, the men who have stayed behind, often with great unwillingness, to make the work of those at the front possible; the amazing band of women workers, full of enthusiasm, full of efficiency, giving themselves without stint; all ready to bear any burden that flesh can support, and make any sacrifices for the common cause. No, there is no lack of sense of public duty. Nor would any one suggest that the virtue of generosity was dead or even short of vigour and spontaneity. Never has there been a time in our recent history when money has been poured out more willingly and more joyfully to help every conceivable kind of war work, and withal not to the detriment of all manner of charitable work already in existence.

No one would urge on this occasion that we have exhibited a jingo spirit, or have been wanting in self restraint or readiness to admit our own shortcomings. No one who has clearly followed this struggle from the start would charge us with national selfishness. We clearly did not enter it with the idea of national aggrandisement, nor does it seem to me that we can be really charged with selfishness and an indifference to the sufferings and ill-treatment of other nations. No, it cannot be said to-day that we show any over-weening confidence in ourselves, or lack of tolerance of others.

We may claim, I think, that in our desire to excel in physical powers, we have not forgotten so completely, as some would have us believe, our mental and moral nature—in fact, our excessive admiration of physical powers is not altogether unconnected with a healthy moral outlook. If the charge that we were a comfort loving people, if not a pleasure loving people, had been true, the readiness of our soldiers to bear the discomforts and miserable conditions at the front to-day without any parade shows how skin-deep this tendency really was. We are not without care and thought and anxiety for physical, mental, and moral development. We are anxious about education, public health, and the wise up-bringing of the young. We rejoice in the boons that the Insurance Act has brought, we are struggling publicly and privately against the scourge of consumption. We are anxious that members of all classes should have something approaching equality of opportunity for bettering their lives. We are anxious about the moral welfare of the race; for example, our temperance efforts and our wish to establish all kinds of counter-attractions, and lately, perhaps, our endeavour to introduce social clubs in all ranks of society.

We are, in fact, dissatisfied with much as we find it in our world, and desire to do something to improve it. We should want to use all opportunities to compass the end we have in view, and yet I feel that the one compelling force of all others—the most potent of all—the true religious enthusiasm, is almost forgotten or ignored. We do not, I should say, really despise religion or the religious man; we probably honour him when we meet him. Rather, too often, we do not give religion a thought, or, if we do, we think we can do without it. We even go so far as to say that it is not suited to our time. We require something more practical. And there has certainly been some justification for this feeling, for has it not been too often urged by the churches that there is something highly meritorious in being what we call a religious person? In the desire to inculcate the religious sense we have striven to accomplish this as though it were an end in itself. I am going to make a frank admission. I go so far as to say that I cannot admit that religion is an end itself. The religious life is what we are aiming at, not religion in the abstract. What we want is that religion and religious practices should help us to be better and more unselfish citizens. All new and protesting religions have always at the outset tried to bring back to their churches that the church exists for man, not man for the church, and it often follows that the compelling force of religion may lose some of its power. This effort was manifest in the Protestant movement of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It appeared again in the Wesleyan movement two centuries later, and it certainly has always been the aim of the Unitarian Churches to get back as far as possible to the simple Christianity of the teaching of Christ Himself. But in these movements, consciously and unconsciously there has been felt the weakening force of the less organised Church. For those who are convinced of the value of religion, the corporate organised force of church system is felt to be unnecessary and often harmful. But for the great mass is this so? In practice do we find that Christ's teaching how to pray, "Enter into thy closet and when thou hast closed thy door, pray to thy Father in secret," can be attained by the great mass of us? Do we not want the corporate sense, the force of example, the regularity of services at fixed times and places to help us to get into the state of mind when it becomes possible to literally follow Christ's orders?

Now this religious sense, being not only non-corporeal, but also not even mental in the ordinary sense, is a very delicate plant. It requires very careful and affectionate cultivation to enable it to grow and flourish and even to keep alive. All our faculties get atrophied by not being exercised—our limbs, our muscles, our power of concentration, our memory all die or become dormant if not kept fresh and active by use. Any art which we have inherited or cultivated which is subsequently neglected absolutely, dies. Thus Darwin, who, as we know, was so delicate that he could not do the amount of daily work that most of us do, had to put aside the cultivation of his musical nature, which was strongly developed, in order to give all the time and energy that his fragile frame would permit to his scientific pursuits, and, he tells us, with the fatal result that his musical sense died. But I need not labour the point. If our artistic sense which is largely corporeal (I mean both connected with the body and mind) can wither away if left without attention, how much more completely and rapidly will the spiritual sense disappear if our religious life is neglected. Our souls need nourishment just as much as our bodies do, and even to the great seers of old, to strong men like Moses and Elijah, a retirement into the wilderness to commune with their Maker became urgent and imperative. Christ even found what strength was gained by withdrawal from the world for a time. To many of us such withdrawals are almost impossible; with nearly every one of us the call is not so insistent that we answer it. And so unless something is provided for us we are apt to let the years go by and leave our souls to starve. This society has always recognised the great value of the corporate religious life—the great value of men, women and children joining together at stated times for public worship. Collective worship often stimulates the worshippers, and I feel sure that a well-filled church with a living congregation stimulates the minister.

I am inclined to ask myself in connection with the subject that will be discussed later on this morning three questions—(1) Has the desire for religion slackened? (2) Has the effort for religion slackened? (3) Has the need for religion slackened? I am forced to admit that in some measure the desire for the religious life has slackened. With the questioning spirit that has grown up with our scientific development, and which has resulted in many of the tenets of our churches, both orthodox and non-orthodox being, if not set aside, at any rate only partially believed, has grown up a wide sense of public duty, an intense desire to improve social conditions. For many years all the churches have been gathering round them a band of workers for social amelioration, and although much of this work has now been taken over by the State, still the activities of the churches remain, and in some measure works have superseded faith. Ministers are not only or even mainly to blame; we ourselves have not asked for the old kind of religion which really was the effort at its best to get closer relations between the human and the divine. We have not supported or flocked to hear those who have endeavoured to reintroduce this. Those who are not satisfied, and there are a great many who are not, urge that religion as interpreted by our religious leaders is a failure, and that therefore religion is not wanted. I believe that until recently the craving for something more had actually decreased.

I am not referring only to the indifference which is evidenced by the small attendance at our own and other churches, but also to what has been, certainly till lately, an indifference to religion among our young people. I believe this is due partly to their wish for some practical work now often carried on by the State, and partly because they find in so many churches, and especially in our own, that no great effort is made to keep them in our ranks. This point of view of how we have failed with our young people, and how we can best correct our weakness in this direction, will doubtless be considered in the coming discussion on the Public Worship Committee's report. I only note it in passing. In our anxiety to avoid making public worship an act of piety or sacrificial duty, in our anxiety to leave everyone to their own decision, we are apt not even to encourage by exhortation the attendance of our young people at our weekly services. It is only the few who can do without the moral compulsion of regular worship, and who can still keep religious life alive and real.

But I should be quite wrong if I were to leave this question without admitting that there are signs both welcome and otherwise of a recrudescence of the desire for religion. The desire for the mystical help of religion which many of our own ministers are endeavouring to satisfy, seems to me the explanation of the relative growth of the Roman Catholic Church, and this notwithstanding the Roman Catholic negation of much held as of the first importance by the free and intelligent criticism which is now so largely accepted. How otherwise can we explain the remarkable choice which is not unfrequently made by intelligent, even highly educated people, in favour of Roman Catholicism rather than Unitarianism? The craving of the spiritual side has been too strong for the mental side, and Roman Catholicism has been embraced because it is believed to be more spiritual than any other Christian form of worship. I am far from admitting the truth of this, but I know it is a commonly accepted opinion. But there are other signs that this desire is not dead, is indeed growing amongst us. Any one who has attended the annual meetings of the Postal Mission, and who has heard some of the letters read, must have been struck by the very real craving there evidenced for this spiritual communion with the Almighty that seems in many directions so dormant, if not dead. But perhaps still more welcome are the replies from many men from the front to the letter from the churches, which, as your President, I was privileged to sign, and to which I have received many grateful replies. You will, I think, agree with me that there is welcome testimony in the extracts of the letters already published that the desire for religion is already being rekindled. It is for us to see that everything possible is done to keep the glow and warmth of this enthusiasm alive.

And this leads me to my second question. Has the effort to quicken our religious life slackened? That our efforts have not been crowned with the success we desire is apparent, but I would not say that this is mainly our fault, still less would I say that our efforts have slackened. I believe that the reverse is actually the case. Perhaps again what we stand for has in some measure hindered our effort. There has been a feeling amongst our people that emotional forms of religion seem often to go hand in hand with practical impiety, and our churches in their struggle against the dividing of our lives into water-tight compartments have been prone to avoid anything that savours of that kind of religion that is divorced from every day life. Hence our teachers have often been apt to lay most stress on works, and I think I am stating an obvious truism when I say that for its size the Unitarian body can show a larger amount of practical endeavour for social amelioration than any other body. This in itself is wholly good, but our efforts should not stop here. Any one who is familiar with the writings and teachings of Mr. Thorn, who in some sense was the founder of domestic missions, and who undoubtedly preached and urged most strongly this duty of practical effort, would agree that no preacher was more insistent on the necessity for fostering in every way the spiritual life.

Since the last meeting of this Conference at Birmingham in 1912, the decision then arrived at to make a great effort to put the stipends of our poorly paid ministers on a more satisfactory basis has been achieved in a manner very gratifying to those who inaugurated the scheme, and to all of us who have taken part in carrying it through. The original scope of the scheme has, as you are all aware, been largely exceeded, and the collection of the fund of £50,000 for the Sustentation Fund does undoubtedly prove that our church is not dead and that there is a large number of people really interested in helping to provide what humanity so much needs. Not only is the total collected remarkable, but the manner of collection is equally so. There are no very large subscriptions, but a good many substantial sums and a great many smaller sums coming from all parts of the country, from many towns and districts where one was unaware that any Unitarian Church or body of people existed, and indeed from many places the names of which I did not even know.

The report on Public Worship itself is proof of our desire to do something to remedy the present state of things, and I am hopeful that the publicity of the report and the practical remedies suggested may do much to quicken the religious life.

I should like here to make reference to the remarkable manner in which the Belgian Hospital Fund so ably administered by the editor of the INQUIRER, by Mrs. Bernard Allen, and by Mr. Kelland, has been worked through our people. I am satisfied that the appeal so vigorously made by the INQUIRER, and so generously responded to, has given all who have taken part, both in work or in money help, a feeling of relief that they could do something to meet the awful misery of this war, especially in a direction that was not, as it were, helping themselves. The effort to show practical Christianity to their neighbour who had exhibited such heroism, who had borne so much, was seized with willingness, and it gives me much pleasure to say a few words as to the excellent organisation and work of the Fund, and as to the need for further help.

And if the desire for religion had slackened somewhat but has certainly latterly revived, if the effort to attain more religion is certainly not wanting, will anyone hesitate as to the need being more imperative than ever? I suppose we may find many who will argue, what is the use of your religion of whatever kind if such a catastrophe as the present can, notwithstanding all your churches and preachers, thinkers and social workers, take place? To such the obvious reply is, it is exactly because so-called religion has been separated from the life of the individual and of the nation, because it has not been part of our lives, influencing our thoughts and actions, that such a hideous negation of all religion has been possible. Surely this world war is another proof, if proof were needed, of our inability to truly progress without religion, without real religion. Is it conceivable that if the countries who forced this war upon Europe had been imbued with the true spirit of religion that they could have been guilty of such a crime? Is it not, on the other hand, quite possible to conceive the state of mind of the individual or of the nation having as its highest sanction only national duty which should dictate as a right act even such a hideous war as is now raging? Is it not precisely because there has been no true religion animating the peoples that this tragedy has overtaken us? I am ready even to admit that, while I have no hesitation in attributing the blame for the commencement of this war absolutely to one quarter, all the nations are in part to blame for it, inasmuch as our lives individually and nationally have been too much divorced from real religion. One of our most delightful essayists in recording some reminiscences of George Eliot wrote: "I remember how at Cambridge I walked with her in the Fellows' Garden of Trinity of an evening of rainy May, and she, stirred somewhat beyond her wont, and taking as her text the three words which have been used so often as the inspiring trumpet calls of men, the words God, Immortality, Duty—pronounced with terrible earnestness how inconceivable was the first, how unbelievable the second, and yet how peremptory and absolute the third. Never perhaps have sterner accents affirmed the sovereignty of impersonal and unrecompensing law." These are terrible words, but is not the present the proof of their condemnation? Do we not realise more truly each day how perverted duty may become, bound as it must largely be to a single nation if without the sanction of religion—how contorted all theories of right and wrong amongst nations become if duty to the nation is the one watchword—how possible it is even for the idea of duty to become degraded into a hideous vice?

Never, I venture to say, has the world more needed the true spiritual insight, the true communion with the Almighty; never, as it was put to me early in the war does the world more need a second Jesus. But have we a true conception of what true religion is? The old idea of calling upon the Almighty to sustain our cause, to help our armies, to give us the victory, is no longer thinkable. We have come most of us to understand that to ask for the divine intervention in mundane matters, to ask that victory shall be accorded to one side and defeat to another, to ask even that our own loved ones shall be spared, even if others must fall in battle, is no longer what is meant by prayer. But while the direct answer in the old way is not to be looked for, while we are even acting wrongly in asking the Almighty to alter or adjust what seemingly must be, or what is due to our own action or want of action, it is our paramount duty, our greatest privilege to endeavour by prayer to receive courage, to endure, to do the right, and as far as may be to see through the awful tragedy of to-day the far off divine event to which the whole creation moves.

Be not afraid to pray—to pray is right. Pray, if thou canst, with hope; but ever pray, Though hope be weak, or sick with long delay.

Whate'er is good to wish, ask that of Heaven, Though it be what thou canst not hope to see. Pray to be perfect, though material leaven Forbid the spirit so on earth to be; But if for any wish thou darest not pray, Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

Let these beautiful lines of Hartley Coleridge be our watchword. May the spirit of true religion reinvigorate all the churches whether our own particular ones or not, for it is the essence of true religion to welcome every attempt to bring about Christ's kingdom on earth. While to us who believe that our system of thought and belief do affect our character, and that, as an American thinker observed nearly fifty years ago, "Unitarianism as a doctrine has, I believe, the future of the world," we strive to avoid the insistence of dogmatic theology. But we do not deny the efficacy of the work of other churches. Our churches are not formed on a basis of unity of belief, but we try to form them on a basis of unity of spirit and of life. In our endeavour to avoid making religion, or in our endeavour to avoid making people accept for religion what is merely formal, conventional, ceremonial, we do not insist perhaps enough on the aid and value of public worship and of regular times set aside for religious services.

Dr. Charles Eliot Norton, writing to Miss Gaskell in 1867, said of Unitarianism: "Having established as a fundamental the rights of private judgment, the utmost liberty of individual opinion, we can no longer unite man in a religious association based on conformity, we must have a free Church to which all who are seeking the highest and best they know, and are trying to express their highest convictions in life, may come and be welcomed on equal terms, whether they call themselves Unitarians, Trinitarians, Christians or unbelievers. I look to see a church arise which shall be a natural human brotherhood for the sake of promoting religious life. It will be the glory of Unitarianism to have been the last step of the ascending series by which man reached at length the platform of the true Church Universal." Although this expectation of Dr. Norton seems to-day as far off realisation as ever, I see no reason for discouragement. Our Churches are not moribund as some have thought, the need for us is greater than it was, I am satisfied that there is a great deal of earnest good work going on. I am equally satisfied that there are a great many all over the country who are longing for just what we ought to be able to provide. Let us see that we leave no stone unturned in our endeavour to provide this, and so do not fall short of the high ideals bequeathed to us by those noble men and women who have gone before.

ETHICAL PROBLEMS OF THE WAR

BY

PROF. GILBERT MURRAY.

ON Wednesday evening at six o'clock, Prof. Gilbert Murray gave an address to the Conference on 'Ethical Problems of the War.' Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone presided over a crowded gathering.

In a short, introductory speech Mr. Rathbone remarked that it was the duty of a Chairman to suppress himself, and he performed the duty with great pleasure that evening seeing that it was the third meeting he had presided over in one day. They welcomed Prof. Murray as the foremost Greek scholar of his time, and felt that it was peculiarly fitting that the representative of that magnificent ancient civilisation which stood at a critical moment between Europe and a barbarous incursion should be there to address them that evening on the subject he had chosen. He was to address them on the ethics of a world struggle which in magnitude and horror far exceeded that struggle of ancient days. The Conference could not be too thankful that one of the most renowned scholars of the day should have come among them—one who had shown practical sympathy with what they tried to stand for by accepting the visitorship of Manchester College, Oxford. The subject he had chosen was one which had exercised all their minds during the last fourteen or fifteen months, and which would continue to exercise them until the end of the war.

Prof. Gilbert Murray said: Mr. Rathbone, ladies and gentlemen, I should like before I begin to express to you very really the gratitude I feel to a body like this in asking me to give this address, and in treating one whose religious views, which I have expressed, of course, in books on many subjects are probably to the left of almost all those here present, not as an outsider, but recognising that people in my position are also capable of a religious spirit, and of seeking after truth in the same way as yourself. I believe that you and I are in real and fundamental sympathy both over religious questions proper, and over a question like this which tests one's ultimate beliefs and the real working religion by which one lives. I think that we may say that probably all here do begin by feeling the war as an ethical problem. Certainly that is the way it appealed to me, and it is from that point of view I wish to speak to-night. Curiously enough I remember speaking in this hall, I suppose about fifteen years ago against the policy of the war in South Africa, and I little imagined then that I should live to speak in favour of the policy of a much greater and more disastrous war, but that is what, on the whole, I shall do. Now I want to begin by facing certain facts. Don't let us attempt to blind ourselves or be blinded by phrases into thinking that the war is anything but a disaster, and an appalling disaster. Don't let us be led away by views which have some gleam of truth in them that this is a war to put an end to war—that it will convert Germany, and certainly convert Russia to liberal opinions. There is truth in that, but we must not be carried away by the hope that it will establish natural frontiers throughout Europe or that it will work a moral regeneration in nations which were somehow sapped by too many years of easy living in peace. There is some truth in all those considerations, but they do not alter the fact that the war is, as I said, an appalling disaster. We knew when we entered upon it that it was a disaster—we knew that we should suffer, and that all Europe would suffer. Now let us run over very briefly the ways in which it is doing evil. Let us face the evil first. There is, of course, the suffering, the leagues and leagues of human suffering that is now spreading across Europe, the suffering of the soldiers, the actual wounded combatants, and behind them the suffering of non-combatants, the suffering of people dispossessed, the refugees, people turned suddenly homeless into a world without pity. Behind that you have the sufferings of dumb animals. We are not likely to forget that. There is another side which we are even less likely to forget, and that is our own personal losses. There are very few people in this room who have not suffered in that direct, personal way; there will be still fewer by the end of the war. I don't want to dwell upon that question; the tears are very close behind our eyes when we begin to think of that aspect of things, and it is not for me to bring them forward. Think, again of the State's loss, the loss of all those chosen men, not mere men taken haphazard, but young, strong men largely, men of the most generous and self-sacrificing impulses who responded nobly to the call for their loyalty and their lives. Some of them are dead, some will come back injured, maimed, invalided, in various ways broken. There is an old Greek proverb which exactly expresses the experience that we shall be forced to go through, "The spring is taken out of your year." For a good time ahead the years of England and of most of Europe will be without a spring. In that consideration I think it is only fair, and I am certain that an audience like this will agree with me, to add all the nations together—it is not only we and our Allies who are suffering the loss there but it is a loss to humanity. According to the Russian proverb "They are all sons of mothers," the wildest Singalese, the most brutal Prussian. And that is the state that we are in. We rejoice, of course we rejoice to hear of great German losses; we face the fact that we do rejoice; yet it is terrible that we should have to, for the loss of these young Germans is also a great and a terrible loss to humanity. It seems trivial, but think too of our monetary losses; of the fact that we have spent 1,595 millions and that we are throwing away money at the rate of five millions a day. Yet just think what it means, that precious surplus with which we meant to make England finer in every way—that surplus is gone.

From a rich, generous, sanguine nation putting her hopes in the future, we shall emerge a rather poverty stricken nation, bound to consider every penny of increased expenditure; a harassed nation

only fortunate if we are still free. Just think of all our social schemes of reform and how they are blown to the four winds—schemes of social improvement, of industrial improvement; a scheme like Lord Haldane's great education scheme which was to begin by caring for the health of the small child, and then led up by a great ladder from the primary school to the University? How some of us who were specially interested in education revelled in the thought of that great idea; but it was going to cost such a lot of money? It would cost nearly as much as half a week of the war. But think what riches we had then, and on the whole although we are perhaps the most generous nation in Europe, what little use we made of them. There is also when we speak of regeneration the spiritual evil to be faced. I don't speak merely of the danger of reaction. There will be a grave danger of political reaction and of religious reaction, and you will have all your work cut out for you in that matter. The political reaction, I believe, will not take the form of a mere wave of Conservatism; the real danger will be the reaction against anything that can be called mellow and wise in politics; the real danger will be a struggle between crude militarist reaction and violent unthinking democracy. As for religion you are probably all anxious as to what is going to happen there. Every narrow form of religion is lifting up its horns again, rank superstition is beginning to flourish. I am told that fortune tellers and crystal gazers are really having now the time of their lives. It will be for bodies like yourselves to be careful about all that. But besides that there is another more direct spiritual danger. We cannot go on living an abnormal life without getting fundamentally disorganised. We have seen that, especially in Germany; with them it seems to be a much stronger tendency, much worse than it is with us; but you cannot concentrate your mind on injuring your fellow creatures permanently without habituating yourself to evil thoughts. In Germany, of course, there is a deliberate cult of hatred. There is a process, which I won't stop to analyse, a process utterly amazing by which a highly civilised and ordinarily humane nation has gone on from what I can only call atrocity to atrocity. How these people have ever induced themselves to commit the crimes in Belgium which are attested by Lord Bryce's Commission, even to organising the flood of calculated mendacity that they pour out day by day, and last of all to stand by passive and apparently approving, while things like the new Armenian massacres are going on under the ægis of their allies—massacres which, as a friend of mine who was inquiring into them said to me to-day, exceed in horror what has ever gone before—all this passes one's imagination. Now we don't act like that; there is something or other in the English nature which will not allow it. We shall show anger and passion, but we are not capable of that organized cruelty, and I hope we never shall be. Yet the same forces are at work. I don't want to dwell upon this subject too long, but when people talk of national regeneration or the reverse, there is one very obvious and plain test which one looks at first and that is the drink bill. We have made a great effort to restrain our drinking; lots of people have given up consuming wine and spirits altogether following the King's example. We have made a great effort and what is the result? The drink bill is up seven millions as compared with the last year of peace. That seven millions is partly due to the increased price; but at the old prices it would still be up rather over two millions. And ahead at the end of all this what prospect is there? Well there is sure to be poverty and unemployment just as there was after 1815. I trust we shall be better able to face it; we shall have thought out the difficulties more; we who are left with any reasonable margin of subsistence will, I hope, be more generous, but there is coming a time of great social distress and very little money indeed to meet it with. We shall achieve no doubt peace in Europe, we shall have probably some better arrangement of frontiers but underneath the peace there will be terrific hatred in the heart of Europe, instead of a treacherous and grasping enemy we shall be left with a deadly enemy living for revenge.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, I don't think that I have shirked the indictment of this war. It is a terrible indictment and you ask me perhaps after describing all that if I still believe that our policy in declaring war was right. Yes, I do. Have I any doubt at all that the war was right? I have none. We took the path of duty and the only path we could take. Some people speak now as if going on with the war was a kind of indulgence of our evil passions. The war is not an indulgence of our evil passions; the war is a martyrdom. Now, let us not exaggerate here. It is not a martyrdom for Christianity. I saw a phrase the other day that we were fighting for the nailed hands of Christ against the mailed fist. That is a thing a man may carry in his own heart, but, of course, it is an exaggeration to apply to our own position, to the position of any nation in international politics. We are not saints, yet we are fighting for a great cause. How shall I express it? We are a country of ripe political experience, of ancient freedom; we are with all our faults, I think, a country of kindly regard and generous ideals and we stand for the established tradition of good behaviour between nations. We stand for the observance of treaties and the recognition of mutual rights, for the tradition of common honesty and common kindness between nation and nation; we stand for the old decencies, the old humanities, "the old ordinances," as the King's letter put it, the old ordinances that have bound civilised Europe together. And against us there is a power which, as the King says, has changed the ordinance. Europe is no longer held together by the old decencies as it was. The enemy has substituted for it some rule which we cannot yet fathom to its full depth. You can call it militarism if you like; it seems to involve the domination of force and fraud, it seems to involve organised ruthlessness, organised terrorism, organised barbarity as a system. The phrase that comes back to my mind when I think of it is Mr. Gladstone's description of another evil—it is the negation of God erected into a system of government. The sort of thing for which we are fighting, the old ordinances, the old kindness and the old humanities, is it too much to say that it is in these things after all that God in man speaks.

The old ordinance is illogical. Of course it is illogical. It means that civilised human beings in the midst of their greatest passions, or at any rate in the midst of their anger and rages, feel that there is something better, something more important than war or victory—that there are some remnants of human brotherhood. Now, I do not want to go into a long list of German atrocities; much less do I want to denounce the enemy. As Mr. Balfour put it in his whimsical way: "We take our enemy as we find him." But it has been the method throughout this war—the method the enemy has followed, to go at each step outside the old conventions. We have sometimes followed. Sometimes probably we have had to follow, but the whole history of the war is a history of that. People fought according to certain rules but one got outside the rules right from the beginning. The broken treaty, the calculated ferocity in Belgium and Northern France, the killing of women and non-combatants in the sea and on land or from the air, the shelling of hospitals, the treatment of wounded prisoners in ways they had never expected; all the doctoring of weapons with a view to cruelty; explosive bullets; the projectile doctored with some substances which would mean a gangrenous wound; the poisoned gases; the infected wells. It is the same method throughout. The old conventions of humanity, the old arrangements which admitted that beneath our cruelties, beneath our hatreds there was some common humanity and friendliness between us, these have been systematically broken one after another. Now observe these things were done sometimes to gain a specific advantage, sometimes as the Secretary of State put it in the case of Miss Cavell, "to inspire fear." And observe that in many places they have been successful. They have inspired fear. Only look at what has recently happened and what is happening now in the Balkans. Every one of these Balkan States has looked at Belgium. The German agents have told them to look at Belgium. They have looked at Belgium and their courage has failed them. Is that the way in which we wish the government of the world to be conducted in future? It is the way it will be conducted unless we and our Allies stand firm to the end. All these points, terrible as they are, seem to me to be real consequences from what happened at the very beginning of the war.

There are probably some people here who differ from what I am saying and I am grateful to them for the patient way in which they are listening to me. To all these I would earnestly say: "Do not despise the diplomatic documents." Remember carefully that it is the one central fact of the cause of this war which is absolutely clear as daylight. Read the documents and read the serious studies of them. I would recommend specially the book by Mr. William Archer, called 'Thirteen Days,' and there is also Mr. Headlam's admirable book, and the admirable book by the American, Mr. Stowell. There the issue is clear and the question is settled. The verdict of history is already given in these negotiations. There was a dispute, a somewhat artificial dispute which could easily have been settled by a little reasonableness on the part of the two principals. If they failed there was the mediation of friends, of peoples who were disinterested—there was a conference possible with the concert of Europe. There was the arbitration of the Hague—an arbitration to which Serbia appealed on the very first day and to which the Czar appealed again at the very last. All Europe wanted peace and fair settlement. The Governments of the two central powers refused it. Every sort of settlement was over-ridden. You will all remember that when every settlement had been shoved aside one after another we made an appeal to Germany to make any proposal herself—any reasonable proposal—and we bound ourselves to accept it. No such proposal was made. All Europe wanted peace and fair dealing except one power or one pair of powers if you so call it, who were confident not in the justice of their cause but in the over-bearing strength of their war machine. As the official newspaper said: "Germany does not enter conferences in which she is likely to be in a minority." By fair dealing they might have got their rights or a little more than their rights. By war they expected to get something like a supremacy of Europe. In peace, with their neighbours reasonable, in no pressing danger, Germany deliberately preferred war to fair settlement and that means, I think, that Germany committed a primal and fundamental sin against the brotherhood of mankind. Of course, all great historical events have complicated causes but on that almost alone I should base the justice and the necessity of our cause in this war. Other objects have been suggested: that we are fighting lest Europe should be subject to the hegemony of Germany. If Germany naturally grows to be the most influential power there is no reason to fight her. We would submit. It is said we are fighting for democracy against autocratic government. I prefer democracy myself, but one form of government has no right to declare war because it dislikes another form. It is suggested that we are fighting to prevent the break up of the Empire, and from motives of loyalty we should have to fight. I think the break up of the Empire would be a great disaster to the world. But not for any causes of that description would I use the phrase I have used or say that in this war we were undergoing martyrdom. I believe no greater evil could occur than that mankind should submit or should agree to submit to the rule of naked force.

Now I would ask again those who are following me as I say with patience, but I have no doubt with difficulty, to remember that this situation—in spite of particular details—is on the whole an old story. The Greeks knew all about it when they used the word "Hubris"—that pride engendered by too much success which leads to every crime. Many nations after a career of extraordinary success have become mad or drunk with ambition. "By that sin fell the angels." They were not so wicked to start with but afterwards they became devils. We should never have said a word against the Germans before this madness entered into them. We liked them. Most of Europe rather liked and admired them. But as I said it is the old story. There have been tyrants. Tyrants are common things in history. Bloody aggression is a common story in history in its darker periods. But nearly always where there have been tyrants and aggressors there have been men and peoples ready to stand up and suffer and to die rather than submit to the tyrant, and the voice of history speaks pretty clearly about these issues and it says that the men who resisted were right. So that, ladies and gentlemen, as with our eyes open we entered into this struggle, I say with our eyes open we must go on with it. We must go on with it a united nation, trusting our leaders, obeying our rulers, minding each man his own business, refusing for an instant to lend an ear to the agitated whispers of a faction or of hysteria. And it may be that we shall have to traverse the valley of death, but we shall traverse it until the cause of humanity is won. And now, ladies and gentlemen, that being the cause, we are girt up in this war to the performance of a great duty and there are many things in it which evil as they are can in some way be turned to good. It lies with us to do our best so to turn them.

If we take the old analogy from biology we are a community, a pack, a herd, a flock. We have realised our unity. We are one. I think most of us feel that our lives are not our own; they belong to England. France has gone through the same process to an even greater degree. Mr. Kipling, who used certainly to be no special lover of France has told us that there the men are wrought to an edge of steel, and the women are like a line of fire behind them. Our divisions before the war it is a disgrace to think of. They were so great that the enemy calculated upon them, and judged that we should not be able to fight. These divisions have not been killed as we hoped, and the remnants of them are still living. I cannot bear to speak of them. Let us think as little as possible about them, and lend no ear, no patience to the people who try to make them persist. As for the division of class and class, I think there, at least, we have made a great gain. I would ask you to put to yourselves the test. Remember how before the war the ordinary workman spoke of his employer and the employer of his workmen, and think now how the average soldier speaks of his officer and how the officer speaks of his men. Inside the country we have gained that unity, outside in our relations with foreign countries we have also made a great gain. Remember we have Allies now, more Allies, and far closer Allies than we have ever had. We have learned to respect and to understand other nations. You cannot read these diplomatic documents without feeling respect for both the French and Russian diplomatists for their steadiness, their extreme reasonableness, their entire loyalty, and as you study them you are amused to see the little differences of national character all working to one end. Since the war has come on we have learned to admire other nations. There is no man in England who will ever again in his heart dare to speak slightly or with contempt of Belgium or Serbia. It is something that we have had our hearts opened. We, who were rather an insular people, welcome other nations as friends and comrades; more, we need these nations. We made these alliances originally on a special principle on which I would like to say a sentence or two. That is the principle of the Entente, which is specially connected with the name of our present Foreign Secretary, and, to a slight extent, with that of his predecessor. The principle of Entente has been explained by Sir Edward Grey several times, but I take two phrases of his own particularly. It began because, as he said, he found that all experience had shown that any two great empires who were touching each other, whose interests rubbed one against another frequently in different parts of the world had no middle course open to them between continued liability to friction or cordial friendship. He succeeded in establishing that relation of perfect frankness and mutual friendship with the two great empires with whom our interests were always rubbing. The second great principle of the Entente was this, that there is nothing exclusive in these friendships. We began it with France, we continued it with Russia, we supported it in reality although not in an actual diplomatic sense with the United States, and practically also with Italy, and any one who has read the diplomatic history will see the effort upon effort we made to establish it with our present enemies. I think we have here some real basis for every sort of alliance in Europe—that sort of better concert for which we all hope. One cannot guess details but it is very likely, indeed, that at the beginning Germany will stay outside and will refuse to come into that sort of concert. If so we must take our enemies as we find them. The fact of there being an enemy outside will very likely make us inside hold together all the better for the first few years. When we are once thoroughly in harness, and have the practice of habitually trusting one another and never intriguing against one another, then, no doubt, the others will come in.

Now I spoke at the beginning about the possible dangers of reaction, but there is a very good side also in the reaction. Part of it is right. It is a reaction against superficial things, superficial ways of feeling, and, perhaps, also superficial ways of thought. We have gone back in our ordinary life to deeper and more primitive things. There has been a deepening of the quality of our ordinary life. We are called upon to face a greater duty than ever before. We have to face more peril, we have to endure greater suffering; death itself has come close to us. It is intimate in the thoughts of every one of us, and it has taught us in some way to love one another. For the first time for many centuries this "unhappy but not inglorious generation," as it has been called, is living and living daily, waiting and hoping, in the habitual presence of ultimate and tremendous things. We are living now in a great age.

A thing which has struck me, and I have spoken of it elsewhere, is the way in which the language of romance and melodrama has now become true. It is becoming the language of our normal life. The old phrase about "dying for freedom," about "Death being better than dishonour"—phrases that we thought were fitted for the stage or for children's stories are now the ordinary truths on which we live. A phrase which happened to strike me was recorded of a Canadian soldier who went down, I think, in the Arabic after saving several people, and before he sank he turned and said, "I have served my King and country and this is my end." It was the natural way of explaining the plain fact. I read yesterday in a letter from a soldier at the front about the death of one of his fellow-soldiers, and the letter ended quite simply: "After all he has done what we all want to do—die for England." The man who wrote it since then has had his wish. Or again if one wants a phrase to live by which would a few years ago have seemed, I do not say unreal, but "high falutin'," he can take these words in everybody's mind: "I see now that patriotism is not enough, I must die without hatred or bitterness towards any one."

Romance and melodrama were a memory, broken fragments living on of heroic ages in the past. We live no longer upon fragments and memories, we have entered ourselves upon an heroic age. As for me personally, there is one thought that is always with me as it is with us all I expect—the thought that other men are dying for me, better men, younger, with more hope in their lives, many of them men whom I have taught and loved. I hope you will allow me to say, and will not be in any way offended by the thought I want to express to you. Some of you will be orthodox Christians, and will be familiar with that thought of One who loved you dying for you. I would like to say that now I seem to be familiar with the feeling that something innocent, something great, something that loved me is dying, and is dying daily for me. That is the sort of community that we now are—a community in which one man dies for his brother, and underneath all our hatreds, all our little angers and quarrels we are brothers who are ready to seal our brotherhood with blood. It is for us that these men are dying, for us the women, the old men and the rejected men, and to preserve civilisation and the common life which we are keeping alive or building. Well, ladies and gentlemen, let us be worthy of these men, let us be ready each one with our sacrifice when we are asked, and let us try as citizens to live a life which shall not be a mockery to the faith these men have placed in us. Let us build up an England for which these men lying in their scattered graves over the face of the green world will be proud to have died.

The Chairman said the audience had expressed its feeling by its quiet listening to the noble address they had heard, and they would like, doubtless, to leave and go home. They could not quite do that, and he called on Mr. Gow to thank Prof. Murray from the bottom of their hearts for his inspiring words.

The Rev. H. Gow said he could not possibly make a speech, but they all felt profoundly grateful for the moving and inspiring address which had been delivered. He felt inclined rather to say "Thank God," than to thank Prof. Murray, as one did of great things in one's life when helped by a person who touched the depths of one's soul. They would all wish to assure Prof. Murray that they invited him there not as a distant outsider but as a friend, and as one with whom they felt the profoundest communion of spirit, and they rejoiced to think he had come there, as he had said in his opening sentences, with that sort of feeling towards them. It was a pride and honour to them to feel their community with him. There was not a preacher or a layman amongst them who could have spoken to their hearts exactly as they wished to be spoken to as Prof. Murray had done that night.

Dr. Blake Odgers in seconding the vote of thanks, said he agreed that it was not an occasion for making speeches or for an ordinary commonplace vote of thanks. Mr. Murray had touched all their hearts; he had come there, and in words so clearly expressed, so beautiful in their periods, he had stated the cause for England in magnificent phrases; he had said the right thing in the best way, and had moved them all. Let them go home and think over not only that night but during the rest of this horrible war the advice he had given them.

The motion having been carried Prof. Murray said they could not expect him to say more than just thank them for the way they had received him that night, and for the way they had listened to him and led him on to show the emotion he was feeling. He would remember that night especially for the extreme satisfaction he felt in speaking to people to whom he could talk intimately, saying just what was in his mind.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital is one of M. Vanderelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depôts for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

WOMEN AS FARM LABOURERS.

THE following description of a practical experiment in farm work by a party of girls from a London School appears in the current issue of Women's Employment. The farm in question is in Dorset, and is run by a woman farmer.

"We were housed in a large new granary, the first floor of which served as an excellent dormitory, being divided into thirteen cubicles. This was approached by an outside staircase. On the ground floor of the 'Barracks' as they were called by all around, for everybody knew about us, were two large rooms, one a kitchen and dining-room combined, and the other the 'common room,' where we could sit and read and write letters. We did not cook for ourselves, but a woman came in every day to cook for us.

After describing our quarters I must now give you an account of our ordinary working day, which began with breakfast at 7 o'clock. Most people did not get up till between 6.30 and 7, though one or two would occasionally be energetic and go bathing in the river before breakfast. We either cycled or walked to work, which began at 8 o'clock and continued till 11.40, when we returned to the Barracks for dinner. In the afternoon we worked in the fields from 2 o'clock until 5.40. After tea we usually went for a stroll or a bathe, but very seldom remained indoors.

The first week in August was very wet, but there was never a hopelessly wet day when we could not work in the fields. The rain was only in showers, and we worked at hoeing mangelwurzels between the showers. During this week we got quite used to being wet and very muddy. At any rate we looked as though we had been working with our overalls covered in mud.

Our chief work for the first week was hoeing and weeding, but after that the weather improved and it was varied with days of harvesting and haymaking.
These we enjoyed very much, though we only had two half-days of haymaking.
We shocked or turned over several fields of wheat, barley, and oats.

One of our most strenuous jobs was picking up potatoes after the machine had turned them out. We all came behind with baskets and picked them up, putting large ones into one sack and small ones into another. We had to get up five tons of large ones each week to send to a camp at Dorchester, but we never found out whether it was the German prisoners' or the soldiers' camp.
We did this in one and a half days.
Potatoing and hoeing did make our backs ache at the time, but as soon as we stopped it was all right.

We had only two or three really hot sunny afternoons, when we felt it was too hot to work, but otherwise the weather was quite good and suited to hard work. We all felt very fit and well while we were there and certainly nobody was any the worse for the work or found it overtired her in any way. In fact when we were asked whether we would come next year if we were wanted, which was very likely, we all said 'Yes' at once.

We do not know yet how much we earned exactly, but it just about covered our board and lodging I think. The hoeing and weeding was paid at the rate of 8s. 6d. an acre, and the other work at 3d. an hour.

Altogether we spent a very interesting and enjoyable time."

PROF. DOLLEY of University College, Nottingham, is announced to give a course of six lectures on 'Before the War—and After' at Essex Hall on Thursday evenings at 7.30 P.M. from November 4 to December 9. Tickets (for the course, 1s. each, for single lectures 3d.), and a detailed syllabus may be obtained from Mr. Hare at Essex Hall or the Rev. Bertram Lister, New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham Place, Hackney, N.E. The lectures are intended to promote serious study. Prof. Dolley will deal with the subject as an historian and not as an advocate of any particular policy. Each lecture will be followed by a tutorial class for those who desire further help in their reading and thought.

OWING to pressure on our space we are obliged to hold over our report of the Council Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association which was held on Thursday, October 26.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bootle.—The Rev. Walter Short, B.A., minister of the Bootle Free Church, has decided that it is his duty to enlist. In the course of a statement, explaining his reasons for taking this momentous step, which he made to his congregation last Sunday morning, he spoke as follows:—

"I could provide many excuses for not going. Only last evening, a letter reached me from the Mayor of Bootle, inviting me to attend a Town Hall Meeting, and to express willingness to join the local Recruiting Committee. It would appear from this that ministers are 'starred' men, that is, men not expected to join the colours. Further, I could allege the excuse of religious and social service. In addition to my work in connection with this church, I serve on two Town Hall Executive Committees; am Secretary of the School Care Committee; and am Correspondent to the Local Government Board on trade conditions in Bootle. More than one person has remarked in view of this work: 'We need people like you at home.' Nevertheless, I have said certain things. First and foremost I have urged that in waging this war the Allies are defending right against might. I have more than once quoted Horace's 'It is sweet and comely to die for one's native land.' I have spoken in affectionate terms to men and boys who are hazarding their lives. During my whole ministry I have preached human solidarity, and the soul's immortality. It comes home to me now to exemplify these things at the peril of my life. If I come back I shall be able to preach with better heart; if I don't return, my friends will have the consolation of knowing that I did my best to translate words into action. My death might very well prove my best sermon. The future is altogether uncertain. Having come to a decision from the very highest motives, I am prepared to go just where the authorities send me. I have obeyed the first order of the Chief Liverpool Recruiting Officer, viz.: to write to the War Office respecting the application for a commission. I propose to take any reply to him, and then carry out his next order. Whether as officer or private, combatant or non-combatant, I shall try to be faithful. I commend to your good will my wife and child. Loyalty to the church on your part would allow of her keeping our home together, and, of course, our grief would be lightened if we knew that woman and child had a refuge and the soldier was not altogether homeless. Let us all pray and work for better times."

Carmarthen College.—During the session ending June, 1915, there have been 34 students in attendance at Carmarthen, and 8 students following Arts Courses at Aberystwyth and Cardiff as External Students. Of these 8 were assisted by £40 scholarships, 3 by special grants, and 5 by £10 bursaries from Dr. Williams' Trustees, and 2 External Students have also been assisted by grants provided by the committee supporting the Independent Students at Carmarthen. During the coming session the course of special lectures and addresses on the Art of Teaching as adapted to the work of the Sunday school, given by Principal Parry, of the Carmarthen Training College, to the two senior classes, will be continued. As some contribution towards the assistance of our soldiers, students of the College are staffing one of the Y.M.C.A. huts at the Scoveston Camp, Pembroke. Several of the students also have joined the R.A.M.C., and have been granted special leave of absence. Having regard to the numerous special claims on public generosity arising out of the war, the Board has not felt justified in making any special appeals for funds this year, and therefore some reduction in the assistance they can render to students is inevitable. The records of the students assisted has, however, been so creditable, especially that of the Arts Students, who are an unusually promising body of young men, and the work is of such importance to the ministry both in Wales and England, that the Board appeals with confidence to the Trustees of the several Funds assisting and to the individual subscribers for their continued and increased support.

Cradley.—The late Mr. James Alfred Brettell.—The congregation of Park Lane Chapel, Netherend, Cradley, has suffered a severe loss in the death, after a brief illness, of one of its wardens, Mr. James Alfred Brettell, in the 59th year of his age, which occurred on the 15th inst. He was the only surviving brother of the Rev. S. S. Brettell, minister of Flowergate Old Chapel, Whitby. He belonged to a family known to have been connected, both on the father's and the mother's side, with the Cradley congregation for two centuries. Succeeding his father as one of the wardens in 1893, Mr. Brettell was exemplary in the discharge of his duties, being most regular in his attendance at Divine Service. He was a trustee of the chapel, schools, parsonage, and glebe, serving as well on the chapel committee. He also acted as secretary to the burial ground of the chapel. His place in the life and work of the congregation will be very difficult to fill. At the funeral, which was conducted by the Rev. A. H. Shelley, there was a large attendance of members of the congregation and the general public.

Darlington.—The Darlington, Gateshead, and South Shields Unitarian Churches have been placed under the care of the Rev. W. H. Lambelle. A meeting to welcome him to his new duties was held at Darlington on October 21st. Miss Lucas presided and expressed the hope that Mr. Lambelle's closer association with the church would lead to a deeper and more earnest interest on the part of all the members.

Girls' Own Brigade.—The first United Service of the Girls' Own Brigade was held on Saturday afternoon, October 9th, at the New Gravel Pit Church, Chatham Place, Hackney. The service was conducted by the Rev. Bertram Lister, and there was a large attendance. On Saturday, November 6th, there will be an entertainment given by the three companies—Hackney, Ilford, and Brixton—in Aspland Hall, Chatham Place, Hackney, at 6.30, in aid of the Brigade Funds. Tickets, 6d. and 3d., may be had from any of the secretaries.

Leytonstone.—The Liberal Christian League. —Leytonstone has sustained a grievous blow by the loss of Lieut. W. A. Piercy, M.A., of the 20th London Regiment, who was "killed in action" in the recent advance in France. A man of high scholastic attainments and very actively interested in progressive Christian thought, he was known and respected by an exceptionally wide circle of friends. For some time he occupied the position of President of the local branch of the Liberal Christian League, and he had also been associated with his mother in the holding of Drawing-room Meetings at Cathay, Cambridge Road, where very able lectures on religious and social topics were followed by discussion. The educational value of these unique Saturday gatherings, their effect in broadening thought, and in fostering a spirit of unity by bringing members of the different churches of the district together in social contact, have made them exceedingly popular. A memorial service was held on Saturday afternoon at Cathay, about 150 people attending, representative of many different denominations. The Rev. T. H. Fenn (Wesleyan) conducted the service, prayers were offered by the Rev. W. C. Fenn (St. John's Parish Church) and the Rev. John Jermyn (Congregational), and an address was delivered by the Rev. Thomas Phillips, B.A. (Bloomsbury Baptist Chapel). Lieut. Piercy's commanding officer Col. Godding, was present and paid a high tribute to his efficiency as an officer and his service in the field. Before joining the colours Mr. Piercy was a master at Tonbridge School, and later at Whitechapel Foundation School, and the headmasters of both of those institutions, Mr. H. Carter, B.A. (Whitechapel), and Mr. J. Evans, M.A. (Tonbridge), were present and related some touching stories, illustrative of his character and the affectionate attachment of the boys in those schools to their teacher.

ANIMALS IN WARFARE.

The extensive military use which is being made of animals at the present time is probably without parallel in history. The horse is, of course, the greatest sufferer, but dogs—in the early days of the war at any rate—were employed by the Belgian army to haul their mitrailleuses. A few weeks ago a number of watch dogs were let loose by the Turks against the French trenches in Gallipoli, and oxen have been used in the Italian campaign to charge against the barbed wire entanglements of the enemy with the hope of tearing them down. All these animals are the unfortunate victims of a state of things which involves cruel hardships for man and beast alike, and are sacrificed for belligerent purposes; but it is pleasant to know that both the French and the Germans are also using dogs for the purpose of seeking out the wounded after a battle. The Berne correspondent of the Morning Post recently estimated that the German dogs had already saved four thousand lives. Every man in charge of an ambulance keeps a diary of his dog's progress, and a dog hospital has been established at Jena where the tired animals may rest and recuperate. In his book 'War Pictures,' Mr. Ian

Malcolm, M.P., has specially referred to the usefulness and intelligence of the dogs connected with the French Red Cross, and to the way in which they have endeared themselves to the Army. It has been found that small dogs, such as terriers, as well as Airedales and retrievers, take to the work keenly, and they are trained so well that they even refrain from barking when they find their man.

THE BURNING-GHAT IN SUSSEX.

One of the Indians attached to the Indian Medical Service who recently died at the Kitchener Military Hospital, Brighton, was buried with Hindu funeral rites, and local imagination was stirred by one of the strangest scenes that has ever been witnessed on the Sussex Downs. The man, says the Times correspondent who describes the occurrence, was a Brahman of the Arya Samaj, and although, being a non-combatant, he was not borne to the pyre by wounded comrades, the ceremonies were very elaborate and peculiar. White chrysanthemums were strewn over the pall, and before the body was carried away a photographer was allowed to uncover the dead man's face and take a photograph of it to send to his relatives in India. The preparations for the burning were long and complicated, "for the ritual demands the right use of four kinds of things: odoriferous things, nutritive things, sweet things, and curative medicines. Some had been melting ghee, some preparing the raisins, the almonds, and other food. When all was ready the body was laid on the pyre, and over it and round it were heaped more and more blocks of wood and much straw. Then crystals of camphor were lighted in a spoon on the end of a long pole, and when they were flaming well were poured on the centre of the pyre. A flame leaped up. A torch made of straw and camphor was lighted at this flame, and applied to the four corners; melted ghee was poured here and there, and soon the whole pyre was ablaze. And while it burned the mourners kept tossing upon it little pinches of ghee mixed with grains and fruits, scent, saffron, and spices." Later on the ashes were put into a little wooden coffer bearing the dead man's name, and in time the coffer would be sent to his family in India.

THE FOREIGN QUARTERS OF LONDON.

Naturally the war has deeply affected the foreign quarters in London, and although the children play about the pavements as usual, there are comparatively few young men to be seen either in the streets or cafés of Soho and "Little Italy." It is stated by the Times that the number of foreigners resident in the Administrative County of London before the war began would be over 160,000. In 1911 the Census returns gave the total as 153,004, and of these the overwhelming majority owed allegiance to one or other of the nations which are now belligerents. Russians and Russian Poles, most of them living in the Stepney district, were in the greatest numbers. There were 39,187 Russians and 23,918 Russian Poles enumerated, and 20,628 of them were males between the ages of 20 and 45. The French colony was 13,803 strong, and 3,964 were males of military age. The Italians numbered 11,668, and included 5,655 men aged from 20 to 45. In addition there were Belgians, Serbians, Montenegrins, and Greeks, and the total population liable to recall for service with the Allied armies would be over 30,000. This figure leaves out of account 10,967 German males, 3,688 Austrians, and 389 Turks, the greater number of whom are now interned.

THE NEW TOYNBEE HALL.

The residential portion of Toynbee Hall is, as many of our readers will know, being transferred to Poplar, owing to the great changes which have taken place in the Whitechapel district and the need for a fresh development of the ideals of the original founder among a normal British working-class population. At the old Toynbee Hall all the familiar activities will still be carried on under the direction of Mr. E. F. Hitchcock, the Secretary, but the Warden and Mrs. St. George Heath will aim at making the settlement in Poplar not so much an institution, but, as Canon Barnett would have wished, a centre of friendship in a neighbourhood that has not been flooded, like Whitechapel, by an immigrant population to which other agencies minister in an effective way. Mr. St. George Heath is greatly impressed with the need for adequate preparation, on the part of young men fresh from the University, to meet the new spirit that will arise in England at the conclusion of hostilities, and he is anxious that cordial relationships shall be formed between those connected with the Settlement and families as a whole, rather than individuals. "We intend," he said recently, "that in our new home there shall be fewer residents living at the centre, and more living out around in tenements and small houses." The cardinal feature of the movement will be the part which women residents from the universities will take part in it, their house being situated a few doors away from the headquarters in Montagu Place off the East India Dock Road. The Poplar group will inevitably be a small one while the war lasts; but it is, perhaps, better that this fresh start should be made in a quiet way, and that the foundations should be well laid for the work of social reconstruction in which the Settlement will undoubtedly play an important part.

GOSSIP ABOUT CHURCHES.

Dr. J. Charles Cox gives some interesting facts about churches and church-folk in his book on 'Pulpits, Lecterns, and Organs in English Churches' (Oxford University Press), which make very entertaining reading. The following is a description of a "marvellous scamp of a vicar, William Lang," who, for a time, in the days of Charles I., occupied the fine pulpit of Bradworthy, Devon. "According to Mr. Baring-Gould this man, who began life as a sand-carrier, was Vicar of this parish and sheriff's bailiff at the same time. After forging several warrants he fled to Ireland; but on obtaining the Bishop's forgiveness he returned to Bradworthy, became a solicitor, and alarmed his flock by threats of action. The next step was to turn the vicarage into a public-house, and worse than that, 'he sent his daughter into the pulpit to catechise the children.' This is said to be the only Church of England pulpit that has ever been occupied by a woman." How many of us know, by the way, the use to which the hour-glass was originally put in our English churches? "The hour glass, sand glass, or sermon glass, came into general use in the Church of England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries for the purpose of regulating the length of the discourse. Hence it was commonly attached to the pulpit or to the adjacent wall, within easy reach of the preacher. There are 103 stands still surviving.... In Cornwall the pulpit hour glass was removed to the parsonage kitchen to aid in regulating the baking of meats."

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF JOHNSON.

The late Mr. W. P. Courtney, in his 'Bibliography of Johnson,' which forms Vol. IV. of "Oxford Historical and Literary Studies," has included much that has not been easily accessible and also much that is new. The pages devoted to the Dictionary are especially interesting, and describes the way in which that prodigious work was completed with the help of six amanuenses who worked in "an upper room fitted up like a counting-house." Some delightful examples of Johnson's grandiloquent definitions are recorded, including the famous one explaining the word "network," and a number of words are given which were described by him as cant terms—i.e., Tory, fib, flirtation, lingo, prig, stingy; as low, i.e., dab, ignoramus, shabby, sham, squabble, tiff; as obsolete or not now in use, i.e., deft, gratefulness, guerdon, jeopardy, wont (custom). 'Rasselas' has proved, perhaps, the most popular of Johnson's works. It was published as 'The Prince of Abissinia' in 1759. During Johnson's life it was not called 'Rasselas,' nor was the authorship publicly acknowledged. An American edition was published in 1771, and two years later Johnson wrote that "the impression is not magnificent, but it flatters an authour," adding that the little book had been translated into Italian, French, German, and Dutch. Mr. Courtney notes seventy-two English editions, twelve French, eleven German, three Italian, two Spanish, and one Dutch, Hungarian, Polish, Modern Greek, and Bengalee translation.

AN ANTHOLOGIST'S ERROR.

The Clarendon Press published a new edition of the Works of Henry Vaughan recently. The Periodical relates that a letter has reached the Oxford Press addressed to "Mr. H. Vaughan." The writer asked for permission to include in an anthology 'The Timber.' Thanking the Silurist for his "immediate attention to this request" the anthologist boldly says, "I will see that you obtain a copy of the book upon publication." He that hath left life's vain joys and vain care,
And truly bates to be detain'd on earth,
Hath got an house where many mansions are,
And keeps his soul unto eternal mirth!

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THE article by Mrs. Bernard Allen on her last visit to France on behalf of the Belgian Hospital Fund, must be postponed to next week. The reason is the very sufficient one that at the time of going to press she was still away. The work in Calais has claimed a great deal of attention and detained her longer than was expected. In her absence the organisation and the daily routine of business have not suffered in any way, thanks to the band of effective helpers whom she has enlisted for the work at Hampstead. Perhaps the full story of the Fund will be written some day, and then the company of faithful women whose names do not appear in our columns will not be forgotten. We have also our organisers all over the country who plan work, see to its prompt dispatch, and keep interest in the needs of the Fund at a high pitch of enthusiasm. To all of them we owe much for whatever success has attended our efforts, and we would beg them to take their full share of the gratitude which it is our privilege to receive whenever we cross the Channel.

It will be noticed that last week the Fund passed another milestone. We are coming within sight of £10,000. Can we achieve that gratifying result by the end of the year? If donors, new and old, wish to express their appreciation of what Mrs. Allen has done that is the way to do it. In present circumstances there is nothing else which would give her such keen pleasure. We do not propose to start any special Christmas fund for the Belgian Hospitals. The ordinary needs are far too pressing for us to indulge in dainties and luxuries of that kind. We suggest that we should throw a substantial part of our Christmas charity into what we are doing already and so achieve the desired result. We hope that some of our readers will take up the idea at once and give it a good start. May we call attention once again to the fact that donations in money and gifts received in kind balance one another very evenly. In order to reach the grand total of the help supplied by the Fund the figures published weekly must be nearly doubled. At present it may be put at not less than £15,000.

LETTERS of gratitude continue to arrive, and next to the evidence of our own eyes they are the best assurance we can have that we are helping on the right lines. One received from a Convalescent Depot the other day announces the arrival of 300 blankets and pillows. "On your next visit," the letter continues, "you will find some changes and many improvements. My colleagues and I are always trying to make our work thoroughly efficient, and we are succeeding little by little. Assistance like that which has been bestowed upon us by the Belgian Hospital Fund is a powerful stimulus and a precious encouragement." Another letter announces the arrival of a large parcel of games, which have been distributed among the hospitals in the neighbourhood and given immense pleasure to the patients.

THE speech of the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on Tuesday is, perhaps, the most important which he has made since the beginning of the war.

It came at a moment when the country is undoubtedly anxious and tempted to lend too ready an ear to the campaign of grumbling in a section of the press. It was also longer than usual, and by the severe compression of unadorned speech—an art in which Mr. Asquith is an adept—contrived to cover the whole field of our naval and military operations. In this way a rebuke was administered to one-sidedness and the gusty fits of despair which magnify misfortunes into defeats. Mr. Asquith pointed out quite truly that the balance of achievement and success is even at the present moment astonishing, and far beyond anything which the most sanguine of us considered possible at the beginning of the war.

FROM this note of proud confidence he passed on to speak quite plainly of some of our misfortunes and mistakes. He accepted full responsibility for the expedition to the Dardanelles, and expressed his own sense of bitter disappointment that so far our efforts have been baffled. At the same time he pointed out that the indirect results have been of great value. An army of 200,000 Turks has been engaged and kept from mischievous enterprises elsewhere; there has been some relief of pressure upon the Russians in the Caucasus; the Mesopotamian expedition, which promises to have excellent results, has only met with weak resistance, and Bulgaria was kept in a state of neutral hesitation for several months longer than would otherwise have been the case. These things do not excuse miscalculations and military mistakes, but they are important aspects of the situation which ought to be carefully weighed. They must at least be taken into account in any competent judgment. Mr. Asquith did well to emphasise them at the present time, because it is precisely these indirect results of military operations, often so far reaching in their effects upon a tangled political situation or the larger problems of strategy, which make the weakest appeal to the civilian mind.

NATURALLY the keenest interest both in the House and the country was aroused by the grave passage in the speech which dealt with the present situation in the Balkans and our obligations to Serbia. We hold that the cardinal fact, which accounts for the disastrous delay in sending troops to re-inforce the Serbian army, must be sought not in our vacillation or lack of policy, but in the defection of Greece. This view, which we have urged before, is borne out by the Prime Minister's own words, which for obvious reasons are marked by caution and reticence.

When the Allies are reproached as they are in some quarters, with being too late in providing active help for Serbia, it must be remembered that up to the very last moment there was the strongest reason to believe that Greece would acknowledge and act upon her treaty obligations to Serbia. When on September 21, after the Bulgarian mobilisation had taken place and M. Venizelos, then Prime Minister of Greece, asked France and ourselves for 150,000 men, it was on the express understanding that Greece would mobilise also. Greece did in fact mobilise under his direction on September 24, but it was only on October 2 M. Venizelos found himself able to agree to the landing of British and French troops, after a formal protest to the French Government. On October 4—I wish this date to be borne in mind—M. Venizelos announced what had happened in the Greek Chamber, but at the same time declared that Greece must abide by her treaty with Serbia.

The next day the King repudiated that declaration, and M. Venizelos resigned. The new Government which succeeded declined to recognise that position as between Greece and Serbia. Despite our constant insistence that Greece should make common cause with Serbia, the new Greek Government, while declaring their desire to remain on friendly terms with the Allies, declined to depart from their attitude of neutrality. These are facts which ought to be taken into account by people who criticise the alleged inertia of the Allied Governments. I make no comment upon that for the moment. I think it better not to do so. But the result is that Serbia, without Greek support, is left to bear the brunt of a frontal invasion from Germany and Austria and a side attack from the King of Bulgaria.

THIS view of the situation was entirely borne out at a later stage of the debate by Sir Edward Grey. He pointed out that the undertaking to protect Serbia from aggression was founded on "a promise which we had made in answer to a request from Greece—a promise made in common with the French Government to send a certain definite number of men to Salonika for the express purpose of enabling Greece to fulfil her treaty obligations to Serbia." In these circumstances, to speak of our betrayal of Serbia, as has been done in some quarters, is to use language which is at once false and deeply injurious to the cause of the Allies. We may be thankful that we are not at the mercy of the critics, who think that the inaction of the Greek army ought to have made no difference to the military situation so far as we were concerned, and that in any case it was our duty to go forward with 150,000 men. Delay, lamentable as it has been in its immediate results, was clearly necessary in order to bring a much larger force into the field, and to ensure that the help of the Allies shall be not merely dramatically effective at the moment but permanent in its results.

OF course, it may be said that we ought never to have trusted Greece at all, and that wise statesmanship would have provided against possible failure, even to the extent of keeping a large army round the corner ready for all emergencies. A suggestion of this kind, when it is examined, is seen to be quite fantastic. Let us face the fact frankly that English diplomacy cannot be carried on on a basis of dark intrigue and universal distrust. Our belief that morality is of vital significance in the political world may appear sometimes to be a source of weakness, but we must cling to it at all hazards. The Real-Politik of Germany, which is the expression of a non-moral theory of the State, is one of the evil things which we are fighting in this war. Its idolatry of force and its methods of base intrigue, bribery, and dishonour, have unfortunately made a deep impression in many of the chancelleries of Europe. Diplomacy, like other things, has been Prussianised by a policy of persistent penetration. The fact that we cannot follow Germany in using these weapons may postpone our success and increase our suffering. Nevertheless, we must accept it all calmly rather than waver in our allegiance to a higher ideal of statecraft, which is rooted in the human conscience and strives to over-rule all difficulties in the interests of freedom and justice.

WE hope that we shall not be accused of any want of respect for our brethren of the Press when we say that they are in danger of carrying their campaign against the censorship too far. The public may begin to suspect that there is a little professional amour propre at the bottom of it, and certainly we are not so ill-informed or so weakly optimistic as many of them suppose. In this opinion we have strong support from an unexpected quarter. A Swiss, of German extraction, who has lately been in England, has written a remarkable testimony to our power to stand the truth in the Berliner Tageblatt :—

The House of Commons [he writes] has recently complained that the British censorship has occasionally eliminated certain passages from enemy communiqués. Nevertheless, I can testify from personal experience that it is quite possible to gain an accurate picture of the general military and political situation from the local papers in England.... I must confess that I was absolutely astonished now and again at the strong dose of truth that the Britisher can stand. Thus it is by no means unusual to see in British illustrated papers pictures of German origin representing Russian prisoners in the Eastern theatre of war or showing the victorious entry of German troops into Russian fortresses.... The determination of the British Government to publish the figures of their total losses is also noteworthy, although their importance is calculated to stagger the broad masses of the people. Furthermore, it must be admitted that British official statements are generally distinguished by remarkable reliability.

Clearly the whole truth is not on the side of the grumblers and the critics!

A TEMPERANCE COUNCIL of the Christian Churches of England and Wales has recently been formed with the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cardinal Bourne, Principal Selbie, and General Booth as Joint-Presidents. One of their first official acts has been to issue a Message to the nation, which contains the following appeal :—

In this solemn hour of national history we are constrained to make a united appeal to the Christian people of Britain to use their full influence to free our land from the curse of intemperance. By the sharp test of war indulgence in strong drink stands revealed as the foe of moral discipline, and a grave and immediate danger to our country. It weakens our power to concentrate on the serious duties we are called to discharge. It stands between us and a whole-hearted return as a nation to the God of our fathers. Face to face with more solemn issues than have ever before confronted our race, we are convinced that the time has come for us, by combined and vigorous effort, to thrust this shame and menace from our midst.

We ask, therefore, that the voice of Christianity shall be raised everywhere in urgent protest against this evil. We appeal that the example of Christian people shall be in all respects consistent with the Christian claim for temperance reform, and that with goodwill, and at all costs, the State shall be supported in its present and future endeavours to remove the peril of intemperance.

MINISTERS AND MILITARY SERVICE.

A FEW months ago we wrote some plain words about the duty of ministers of religion of military age to regard the call to enlist as addressed to them as well as to their friends, their brothers, and their College chums. We urged that they ought not to shelter themselves behind their profession or to allow motives of convenience or attachment to their present work, which would not be regarded as adequate in the case of other men, to weigh heavily with them. Things were being said, and said quite sincerely, from most of the pulpits of the land, which implied that this conflict is one for justice and freedom, and that the young men who are giving up everything to serve their country are accepting the noblest duty of their lives and winning the martyr's crown. If this high praise can be showered on the laity, is there any reason why the clergy should not perform the same duty without dishonour to their sacred calling? This question seemed to us to require a straightforward answer, and we wrote as we did because we honour the ministry far too highly to be content with any conventional reasons for a policy of inaction and the refusal of dangerous duties.

At the time the issue was a somewhat novel one for the public mind. We were met with a good deal of agreement, with some sharp criticism, and with a little quite useless anger. On the whole, it seemed to be felt that it would be time enough to raise the question when the need for men became more serious. That need has now arisen, and the whole subject has become one of urgent public interest. For one thing during the past few weeks there has been a steady stream of ministers who have felt that they must take their place in our citizen army. Their action has been welcomed with unmistakeable signs of public approval; it has done not a little to raise the clerical profession in general esteem; and it has been accepted as a moving example. But suddenly something else has happened. Thousands of ministers all over the country have discovered that they are "unstarred" men. They have received Lord Derby's letter inviting them to enlist, and in most cases the clerks responsible for addressing the envelopes have called them plain "Mr." In other words they have been treated exactly like all their fellow-citizens. That seems to us exactly right. We have to raise and keep in the field a citizen-army drawn from the whole available manhood of the nation, and no man is exempt, whatever the calling may be to which he has dedicated his life, from these first claims of citizenship. We are sorry to see that the Bishops of the Church of England are instructing their younger clergy to disregard the invitation. The two Archbishops have extracted from Lord Derby a promise that he will do nothing to override their veto. Apparently the contention is to hold good that the clergy are a class apart, precluded by special vows from fulfilling the duties which they prescribe for others. The reaction of such a policy upon the mass of the population who, without being anti-clerical are critical or indifferent, is not likely to be favourable to the cause of organised religion. Are the clergy the only profession with a high sense of dedication to their calling or keenly sensitive to the interruption of cherished plans of work? Our ordinary rules and standards of judgment break down in presence of a supreme emergency. There are occasions, and this is one of them, when loyalty to our common manhood is the test which must be applied indifferently to all men, be our profession what it may. We do not mean to say that one rule should be applied to all cases. We are not at all blind to the need of calm judgment and discrimination. It is the official veto which, in present circumstances, seems to us to be lacking in a sense of national duty and deeply injurious to the best interests of religion.

In the case of the Nonconformist ministry anything like an official veto is, of course, out of the question. But in many places the same kind of clerical instinct is likely to act as a drag upon decision; and any exemption from official pressure which the Church of England succeeds in securing for itself will, no doubt, be extended as a bare matter of public equity to the Nonconformist bodies as well. All the greater honour to the men who will accept no exemption for themselves, and cheerfully go to seek a post of dangerous service which no public opinion has imposed upon them. The case for the young minister could not be stated better than in the following words of farewell which the Rev. R. Nicol Cross has addressed to the members of his congregation in Leeds. We leave them without comment, to make their own impression:—

"I desire to thank the Committee and congregation for their readiness to release me in order to answer what seems at the moment to be the more urgent call. I do not think it will be loss in the end whatever the sacrifice and inconvenience at present. I go to a work in the R.A.M.C. in the midst of one of the greatest wars of history, a work essentially Christian and humanitarian, which will appeal for ever to the imagination if ministers and churches throughout the land will rise to it. I'd like to see a third of the pulpits of England empty while the parsons throw off their robes and collars, and with nothing about them but their manhood and the khaki with the Red Cross on it, lay on themselves the lowliest duties of the stricken field, and hand the cup of cold water where brave men thirst. For months I have seen the young men, your sons, pass one by one out of our church and school to the army and the field, to face dangers and wounds; even the girls have been going to nurse in Hospitals. Is my place just now by their side or yours?"

Lord Derby has yielded to episcopal pressure in regard to fully ordained ministers, but he makes it quite clear that he has no intention of extending this leniency to students in theological colleges. They will be urged to join the army now. If conscription comes they will, as a matter of course, be compelled to serve. This is perfectly right. All students, whatever their aim in life may be, are on precisely the same level as far as public duties are concerned. Instead of wanting to provide excuses or secure exemptions for students of divinity we would encourage the idea that they may well be expected to go with greater alacrity than others, just because the need is urgent, the duty is dangerous, and the call to chivalry and self-sacrifice one of the clearest that has ever come to expectant youth. We are glad to say that in the last few months many of the theological colleges have sent their ablest men, the keenest in mind, the most virile in conscience, the richest in gifts of ministry, into the army. It is inevitable that it should be so. From the beginning the call has captured the best men first. The empty seats and the deserted class-rooms must be a source of pride for all who look the situation in the face and understand what it really means. Every college which seeks to be the home of duty and a nursing-ground of manly virtue will measure its success by the number of its absentees, just as in the family circle our pride is centred in those who go and not in those who stay.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

To the old paths, my soul ! Oh, be it so !
I bear the workday burden of dull life
About these footsore flags of a weary world, Heaven knows how long it has not been ;
at once,
Lo ! I am in the spirit on the Lord's Day
With John in Patmos. Is it not enough
One day in seven ? And if this should go,
If this pure solace should desert my mind,
What were all else ? I dare not risk this loss.
To the old paths, my soul !

STAND against covetousness ; have the heart, as members of a great nation and not only at home and among your friends, to live in the Spirit of Christ Jesus ; for, to care for the whole more than for ourselves, to love and to die for the great things of justice, freedom, love, pity, truth—is to be the maker of peace, one of the great atoning band who shall at last see all nations atoned together, bound together by mutual self-surrender into the glorious humanity that Christ shall present to God when the harvest of the world is ripe.

STOFFORD A. BROOKE.

THOU whose help is always nearest when most needed, comfort those who mourn and are oppressed with their afflictions, or labour under the burden of a troubled mind ; relieve the poor, and defend the cause of the fatherless and widow ; strengthen those who languish on the bed of sickness, and those who are departing from this world. Keep them all from sinning against thee and from being overwhelmed by too heavy a sorrow. Let the events of their lives be under the control of reason and thy Holy Spirit, and end in holiness, in peace, and joy eternal. AMEN.

"A QUAKER APOLOGIA."

READERS of the last number of The Hibbert Journal cannot have failed to be interested by the article, 'The War : a Quaker Apologia.' There is so much that is beautiful in the spirit in which Mr. Graham writes that one would fain believe that his conclusions can be justified. It would be easier to many of us to adopt his standpoint and bear all the unpleasant consequences of doing so, than to differ from him as we are obliged to do under the stress of that call of conscience which he seems to recognise as final despite all the texts and authorities which can be cited to prove that we are wrong.

It is curious, and also suggestive, of the weakness of his position, to note how he begins by repudiating any final authority in texts, and later on discusses an "array of texts"; curious also that among those quoted we do not find this : "If it be possible, as much as in you lies, be at peace with all men." If texts were to decide the matter we might well be content with that. For, in the court of conscience it was not possible to us from whom he differs to maintain peace.

Very curious also is the line drawn as to the use of force. It is not altogether repudiated. "Friends believe in the police and in all analogous uses of force." So then I may break my unruly neighbour's head with my baton if I happen to be a constable, but I may not as a soldier use my rifle against an enemy who is invading and ravaging my country. "We do not," Mr. Graham says, "believe that foreign nations are criminal populations, nor that war works the ends of justice." Now that is just what many of us do believe of the peoples who have ravaged Belgium and Armenia, and of the war which is being waged to restrain them. There must, of course, be Germans who disapprove of much that has been done, no doubt some Turks also ; but a nation as a whole must be judged and classed by the policy and methods in which it expresses itself, and of which there is no evidence that any considerable section of it disapproves.

He makes no distinction between war waged for purposes of aggression and greed and war waged in defence of liberty and our noblest social and political ideals. All war is indiscriminately condemned. That waged by the Dutch Republics to achieve their freedom is no more legitimate than that waged by Germany in her attack on Belgium. He will not listen to any comparison between the fierce industrial warfare which disfigures our so-called times of peace, with all the mass of mental and physical suffering which it entails and all the bad passions which it arouses, and such a war as we are now engaged in. An absolute line seems to be drawn at the point when a man stands forward openly, arms in hand, ready to give his own life as to take that of his opponent, no matter how good the cause may be. He tells us that "this lumping together of such diverse things leads us nowhere in ethics." Is he not guilty of just such a "lumping together of diverse things" when he indiscriminately condemns all wars, and tells the Christian ministers among us who have defended our part in this war that it would be "more frank avowedly to drop Christ for the time" ?

It is an old device, or may we not say a vice, in controversy. You do not agree with my view of Christianity therefore, you are no Christian. The argument, if it be one, is based on the assumption of a knowledge as to what Jesus would have done under given circumstances which your opponent has not got. No such circumstances as those in which we find ourselves to-day were presented for the consideration of Jesus and his immediate followers. Mr. Graham tells us that "Gospels and Epistles were written to meet immediate needs, and under the Roman Peace war was far away and not in question." He is, indeed, a man confident in his own opinion who would have us believe that under no circumstances whatever would Jesus have sanctioned resistance by force of arms to such aggression and cruelty as we are withstanding. As has been elsewhere pointed out such a man must believe that Jesus would have contented himself with verbal remonstrances which had proved unavailing—for men did not always do his bidding—while a woman was being violated or a child tortured in his presence, and would not have intervened with all the force he could command to prevent the crime. But, perhaps, it will be argued that in such a case he would have acted as a policeman.

If we did believe such a thing, and believed also that the doctrine of non-resistance was the central and vital point of the teaching of Jesus, then it may be there would be some justification for Mr. Graham's challenge, and that we should have to "drop Christ"—one wishes some other phrase had been used—until such time as we could come to a different reading of his mind. In doing so we should only be conforming to that spirit of absolute fidelity to conscience which breathes through all his life and teaching. For it was not to a mere slavish obedience to himself that he summoned us, but rather to a loyalty to "a Kingdom of God which was within," a loyalty which is to-day inspiring our young men in their thousands to take up the challenge of evil, and, hard though it is, to take life as well as to give life in what they believe to be a sacred cause.

Let us in conclusion, offer a tribute of admiration for the splendid work of ministration to the suffering in which so many of the Friends are engaged, and, it must be added, of even greater admiration for the courage and devotion of those of their young men who are not only facing the dangers of the battlefield, but also incurring all the risks involved in breaking with a powerful tradition of their community.

IGNOTUS.

A NOTABLE PARSI OF TO-DAY.*

IN order to discover the whereabouts of our notable Parsi we must journey to India, since he was united to that country by birth and by heart. Having found him—an easy task—we have to admit the fact of his genial and really religious personality. Our first glimpse of the man assures us of the speciousness of his spiritual reach. Himself a Parsi, his biographer is an Indian of another impress. A knight of world-wide celebrity introduces him to us. An English-woman, late wife of the present Viceroy, makes one of a quartette in our earliest picture. The biographer catches and secures this aspect, and frames it in a sentence, "Malabari has brought East and West together for the service of this ancient land, and it is in this union that lies the salvation of India." His heart enshrined India. He realised her weakness as well as her strength, and loved her deeply and enduringly. His one desire, his one aim, was the well-being of her people. As Sir Valentine Chirol puts it, "Malabari's life was a long struggle to accomplish for himself and to help his people to accomplish the arduous task of reconciling Eastern with Western conceptions and Eastern and Western methods. The fire of an intensely vital soul seemed to be consuming the frail body, but to the end he never spared himself."

Malabari recognised that the most pressing need for India and the Indians was release from the bondage of archaic social institutions. Among these institutions that of child-marriage and child-widowhood exercised him above all others. The cry of his soul on this account rings out sonorously "Emancipate the women of India, ye English rulers restore to the widow her birth-right of which she is robbed by usurpers who owe no allegiance to God or to man."

Through him, B. M. Malabari, light came again from the East, as in differing degrees it has come within our own time, shed around us by Vivekananda and by Rabindranath Tagore; Vivekananda, wandering monk, practical mystic, orator, and indefatigable reformer; Tagore, poet, philosopher, reformer also. To know such men face to face, to hear their voices vibrant with a passion for their own people, and for all peoples, to see the light of love of God and man shining in their eyes is an inestimable privilege.

Malabari, renouncing his poetic aspirations in early age, became rather the journalist than the preaching philosopher. He possessed a veritable genius for the self-effacement of qualities which would have made him famous among artists of rhythmical renown. He "spent lavishly for others; he was ready to give himself, his money, his powers, his peace. For himself he wanted nothing; he grudged even the few annas which he spent on himself. He bought a ready-made suit of clothes and kept it for years. Yet hardly a post went out without a cheque or two from him to those who sought his help."

These five souls to whom we have referred were at one in holy realisation of renunciation. Vivekananda, far and away the dominant speaker at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago, moving from village to village, clad in mendicant garb, with shaven head and sandalled feet, having for possessions a staff and a begging-bowl. Tagore, setting aside his fortune for the welfare of his pupils, bare-headed and in a single garment of white web, adjusting his philosophy to the requirements of music and song and of art in its many forms of service, human and divine. Malabari, dedicating himself, his genius, his persuasive personality, to the uplift of India and Indian folk regardless of creed or caste. Considering these light-bearers and light-bringers, we have to regard each, as far as may be possible to us, in his own aspect, through the effect and colouring of his own atmosphere. He who carries and conveys the light is, after all, a vehicle, a lantern, by whose agency the light is exposed and through whom it illuminates. The human element must be taken into account, its environment, its surroundings. Birth, breeding, education, senses inherited from long-passed ancestry, each is a factor in the fashioning of prophet, poet, or priest. Geographical situation, historical happenings, religious tutelage, each of these, too, has contributed to the make-up which is presented to the world. We have to accept the light-carrier as thus presented. His view of things, his expression of them, brings the conception of his vision to ourselves, and, so bringing, adds appreciably to our own. The light he bears, the light you and I may bear with reverential hope, is tintured inevitably by that self-colour which is inseparable from you or me or him. Malabari displayed his light effusively, it shone before men. It played upon just those facets of truth that appealed to him. He beheld them in all their beauty and their purpose. Other phases of the one great jewel of price he saw and acknowledged; but his faculty of realisation dwelt upon and utilised those aspects which made direct and irresistible claim to his regard. He followed the music that he heard wholeheartedly, knowing that it led him toward the goal for which he valiantly set out. Malabari was born a few years before the uprising in India. The date is given as 1853. "He passed from childhood to youth in an atmosphere which was full of the stories of the Mutiny." He was still young when Queen Victoria was proclaimed Empress of his Motherland. Sirdar Jogendra Singh remarks that "it was these first impressions which fostered in Malabari the growth of an unswerving confidence in the good intentions of the British Raj. He saw the hand of God in the shaping of events which were bringing East and West together for the fulfilment of a divine purpose." When he was five years old his father died. The widow, not much more than a girl, poor, almost unaided sought shelter with her parents at Surat, trudging on foot for seventeen weary days, bearing the burden of her boy. Later, she married again, and the stepfather, a herbalist, gave his name to the child and employed him in drug-pounding, taking but little other interest in him. Happily, at Surat, all doors opened to him, Hindu, Mohammedan, and Parsi, alike.

When the Parsi Pilgrim Fathers fled from persecuting Persia they wandered thither, and were welcomed by the Rajah. They held that from the beginning of things there exist two spirits, the principles of light and life, of darkness and death. Zoroaster taught devotion to goodness and perfect purity, and eternal war against evil. It was this simple faith that moulded Malabari's character. Such were the traditions of his race. He adhered to the ideals of his youth. His mother's death saddened and subdued his joyous soul. He had revelled in following wandering minstrels, his voice had joined in their song. Now, for awhile, he felt the hand of death. He became silent, self-communing. Then, poetry and humour reasserted themselves, and again he resolved to become an instrument of service and of divine love. For solace, though only 12 years old, he turned toward philosophy. We figure him studying Brahmanic, Buddhist, and Zoroastrian lore, and clinging finally, as formerly, to the Parsi formula, "Good thought, good word, good deed." His stepfather, growing unkind and unhelpful, he determined to work out a future for himself. He contrived to join an Irish-Presbyterian school. Of Mr. Dixon, the clergyman in charge, he spoke with enthusiasm, while his ability delighted his tutor. His life was poor and hard. He taught younger lads so as to earn food and clothes and books. Unlike many of his class, he was not married, and had no children to support. He qualified himself for matriculation at Bombay. A reputed miser, touched by the boy's poverty and desire, gave him twenty rupees. Half this sum paid his examination fee. With the other half he left for Bombay to make his way in the world. The examination lasted four days. A month elapsed before the result was announced. Malabari had failed in mathematics. After great endurance he secured a school appointment at twenty rupees a month, raised to forty at first, to sixty later. For four years he struggled for his pass. He gained it in 1871, and decided not to work for a degree. He made his home in Bombay, resolved at all costs to elevate the position of Indian women. Encountering much opposition, but unwearied, he persevered. "It is," he said, "in the development of woman's true nature that we must seek the future greatness of our people."

After years of incessant labour Malabari obtained "The Age of Consent Bill," the best he found it possible to reach for the time. It raised the age to 12 years. Education, taxation, famine, disease, sanitation, all came within his purview and his eager help. His fine character won esteem from ruling chiefs, who sought and obtained his advocacy. Thus, he who arrived in Bombay friendless and unknown befriended rajahs and maharajahs, and was destined also to respect and intimacy on the part of successive Viceroys. He travelled greatly in India, mostly on foot, so that he might know the actual position of the peoples at first hand. His paper, The Indian Spectator, spoke for all, not for a party. His magazine, East and West, started in 1902 with the avowed object of bringing East and West together, welcomes contributions from Indians and Britons both. The poet became a journalist, but the journalist was informed by the poet's soul. The eternal craving of the East for peace was met, in him, by the Western idea of unremitting effort. From 22 years onwards he realised that active contact with men was a better preparation for salvation than the meditative seclusion which attracted him. "India," wrote Max Muller, "wants more such dreamers as he." His strenuous, self-denying life closed in 1913. The King wired his sincere regret, and the Queen's, at the death of an old friend. The tiny man with a great soul had won his way into many hearts.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF UNITARIAN, LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, FREE CHRISTIAN, PRESBYTERIAN, AND OTHER NON-SUBSCRIBING OR KINDRED CONGREGATIONS.

THE REPORT ON PUBLIC WORSHIP.

On Wednesday, October 27, a Communion Service was held at Stamford Street Chapel, Blackfriars, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Hargrove and the Rev. F. K. Freeston. At 10.45 the Conference was opened at Essex Hall, the President, Mr. Hugh Rathbone, in the chair. The Presidential address was published in our columns last week. A discussion on the special Report on Public Worship which was in the hands of those present followed, the subject being introduced by the Revs. Joseph Wood and Dr. Mellone.

THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD, after a few words as to the origin of the Report, and possible criticism that might be applied to it, said that it was the summing up of a sufficient body of opinion to justify consideration as to a situation which all had felt vaguely to be unsatisfactory, although in this respect they were not any worse off than their neighbours. The war had, however, changed the outlook a good deal since it was compiled. Awful and deplorable as that war was, it had effected a certain transvaluation of values apparently providing, or suggesting, a remedy for some of the reasons given for church decline. There was truth in Bernhardt's description of war as a "terrible medicine." But if peace and not war was the normal condition and legitimate object of a civilised society, the maintenance of a healthy national life depended on a general recognition of the permanent elements of human welfare. The section of their inquiry dealing with the temper of the age in which they lived touched on a widespread forgetfulness of those permanent elements. On no point were the replies more unanimous than on the evils, from the point of view of church and Sunday School work, of the frivolity, the absorption of so many in sport, the greed for pleasure and excitement, the impatience of restraint and the lack of sober thought which had marked so much of the nation's life prior to the war. That had been largely changed, and would be still more changed as the war went on. A more serious view of life and its responsibilities was making itself felt, and the magnificent response of the young men of our land to their country's call must bring out a truer estimate of things that were worth while, to the immense advantage of the Church as a whole, always provided she had the wisdom and courage to face the new conditions of the new time that was before them. For the ministry and for the colleges there would be an entire change of emphasis. Some of the old "copy-book virtues," as they were often called, would make a new appeal to minds whose former craving for excitement was now so tragically satiated, and the minister would be able to turn from speculations to the practical necessities of the earnest virile soul, seeking those ultimate issues which alone give value to life. And with this would come a revived sense of the value and place of public worship. Denominationalism would count for less, but religion would count for more. Many held aloof from the churches because, they said, the lives of the church members and the atmosphere of worship were out of touch with the life of the world and its affairs. The necessity of the church being faithful to her ideals was one of the things which the war was pressing home to them. Mr. Wood also touched upon other aspects of the question—the fact that ministers are often poor preachers, unable to appeal to clever young minds impatient of defects and ineptitudes; that public worship was sometimes a trial to sensitive nerves owing to its crudities and ignorance of musical art, or its failure to create a devotional atmosphere. Yet the Sanctuary was not accidental but fundamental to human life, and if it was not first and foremost the home of the soul—existing to create ideals, to guide the currents of action, and make men and women righteously efficient, rather than to run after every new social fad, it was not fulfilling its chief function. What was wanted was a church that should be ethically and spiritually progressive, and should have for its supreme care—religion. Then there was the question of the religious education of the young. The correspondents quoted in the Report were unanimous in regard to the importance of this part of the Church's mission, and all were agreed that the chief factor in the decline of public worship was the slipping out of bonds of the young people of the families and schools, in spite of all that was being done to retain them. He personally felt that the dingy rooms in which the classes were held, the dullness of the methods adopted, often the inefficiency of their teachers had a great deal to do with this. The mere school idea had been too prominent. They needed adequate management—if necessary, the superintendence of paid certificated teachers—to make the teaching in the school (if such a word must be used) at once orderly, spirited, and varied, giving a sense of pleasure. If they wanted to see how the thing could be done they ought to spend a Sunday at Bournville, and persuade Mr. Archibald to take them over the model school. Then, too, there was the influence of the home and family life. It must be reluctantly admitted that the religious training received by their children in the home was not so watchful, constant, and effective as in previous generations. There was cause to rejoice that the old strict Sabbatarian notions, the learning of dry catechisms, and the use of the Bible as a task-book no longer existed, but other things had also been dropped which were an irreparable loss—the habit of morning and evening prayer, the daily reading of the Bible, the once familiar practice of gathering together on a Sunday evening to sing the great hymns of faith and love. In the absence of these old-fashioned and yet perennial "means of grace" the religious education of the children suffered greatly. In conclusion Mr. Wood laid stress on the importance of not going to church solely for what they could get in the way of help. What we could give was much more vital, encouraging all who were working to purify the stream of life, helping to deepen the atmosphere of devotion and human fellowship, and adding something to the common stock of holy feeling and desire.

DR. MELLONE said that the Report indirectly and unintentionally, raised the vast and vexed question of the curriculum in the theological colleges, the organised system of instruction suitable for the student for the ministry at the present time. He referred to the question not in order to discuss it on that occasion, but in order to emphasise a matter of principle, which, in his opinion, lay at the root of it, and upon which they must make up their minds if they were to be in a position to criticise what the colleges were doing or not doing. The fundamental principle at issue lay in the answer to this further question: Were they going to throw the Bible overboard or not? He would at once say that so far as the college with which he was connected was concerned they were not. He believed that the value of that mighty instrument of ethical and spiritual religion would grow, not less, but greater in the days to come. But the retention of the Bible as the minister's chief instrument of religious instruction and inspiration involved for him the necessity of understanding it in a special, a more thoroughgoing and comprehensive way than was necessary for the rank and file; and this, again, involved the necessity of a definite scheme of studies comprising criticism, history, doctrine. It would be very interesting to see the results of a questionnaire on what studies really were useful to the minister. The variety of answers would be very great. From his own experience of discussions of this nature he gathered that, in the opinion of some whose age, perhaps, precluded great maturity of judgment the best thing would be for the student to do what he liked during his college years in the matter of reading. In that case they would have one studying Chinese metaphysics, another mediæval architecture, another the writings of George Bernard Shaw, and here and there an individual of a rarer type devoting some attention to the great historic facts out of which the movement called Christianity sprang. He would again emphasise the principle that the retention and right use of the Bible lay at the root of the question concerning college curriculum. Proceeding, Dr. Mellone said that the Report towards the close dealt with things that were both true and old relating to the religious practice of the churches in its bearing on the life of young men and women beginning to face the difficulties of the world. The Report also dealt with things that were new and debateable. Detailed specimens were given of the replies to the questions sent out which seemed to him to come under the title he had once discovered on the back of a little girl's diary, "Thoughts and Feelings." Some were the conscientious, considered judgments of ministers and laymen who had grasped the importance of the questions and taken counsel to deal with them fittingly. Others were casual complaints from discouraged, disheartened, or discontented ministers or laymen. Now it might be a good thing that they should be discontented, but it was not a light thing that they should be disheartened and discouraged. He had seen men in early youth going forth to their work full of energy and enthusiasm who, when he met them ten or twenty years afterwards, had become weary and almost hopeless plodders settling down to a routine of non-success which they accepted because they could not make it otherwise. That was an appalling thing, and his sympathy went out to these men, but he could not attach much weight to their judgment on the problems of Church life. He felt bound to say that the middle pages of the Report seemed to him the least important and least instructive part of it. He was, in fact, less interested in what they thought about themselves than in what representative thoughtful men in other Christian communions felt about them, and in the cumulative effect of the impressions which prevented so many progressive minds from identifying their lot with that of Unitarians. In every quarter of Christendom there was the fullest recognition of the splendid achievements of our leaders in religious thought and philosophy, and of the simple integrity in public and private life, the generosity and devotion in every philanthropic cause, which is a tradition in many Unitarian families, and can be detected in our humblest communions. But the difficulty of our fellow-Christians was this—they felt that our whole position was one of excessive criticism rather than construction, and we could not get over this by telling them that we believed in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. The Unitarian attitude had been one of protest, and it had produced a temper ever ready to stand on the defensive or to criticise. We lacked, too, it was felt, an appreciation of the elements of truth which underlay the creeds and for the sake of which the creeds were upheld. Closely connected with this was the charge of coldness, the justice of which was denied, but which was so persistent that there must be some truth in it, and the idea that our body consisted of little groups of people temperamentally loving dissent for its own sake and preferring separation rather than union in a larger whole. These criticisms were instructive. They pointed to real defects, of which the members of the Committee responsible for the Report were evidently conscious, and for that reason he welcomed its appearance.

Dr. Mellone then proceeded to emphasise the vital importance of those old and true things to which he had referred, and to which attention was drawn at the close of the Report. He also emphasised the fact that the authorities of the colleges had for long been aware of the importance of these matters and had made practical provision for interesting the students in them. In conclusion, he said he did not believe that their difficulties as a body were going to decrease, for, apart from the world's great trouble, which would set all the Churches harder problems than ever they had faced before, there were in their own body mischievous and disruptive tendencies in opinion and congregational action; but as a communion they were entrusted by God with a task which they alone could perform, a task which would not be done unless they did it. Often at gatherings like the present he felt conscious that something greater than they knew was seeking expression through them. Beyond and above all the dangerous elements among them there was a strong stream of healthy spiritual and intellectual life. It might be repressed, it might not show itself in a way that others could appreciate, but it was God's gift to them, and marked out for them the work He had appointed them to do.

THE REV. V. D. DAVIS said that while they were grateful for the Report and the many questions it raised, they were faced at the present time by a deeper problem which they wished to hold in their hearts, and to which the whole of their time must be devoted. The particulars given in the Report belonged to the pre-war period; but now they were confronting life and death, and the only true spirit in which they could meet these awful issues was that so nobly expressed for them by Dr. Jacks in his sermon the night before. They had to realise that their churches did not belong to them but to God, and that He had called their members to His service. Religion, if it was to be of any value, must be the religion of redemption and inspiration, taking them out of themselves and making them fit for the task to which they were appointed. Their churches would only prosper in proportion as they learnt this self-surrender, and asked of God what he demanded of them. They were thankful for the inheritance they had received in their churches, and all that was needful was that they should give themselves with a more perfect spirit of loyalty and devotion. Then their problems would be solved, and the people would gladly come to their services, men and women and children alike, conscious of being in the atmosphere of the eternal things of God.

MRS. H. D. ROBERTS expressed the opinion that the religious life of the church and its influence upon the community depended upon the personality of the minister. It might seem a trite and commonplace thing to say, but speaking as a member of a church in which Sunday after Sunday she and a band of faithful adherents were helped by the atmosphere of devotion and the spiritual suggestions received there, she felt strongly that the churches needed more than anything else men of deep religious experience who could speak the thoughts of God to human souls that were longing for a spiritual message. One would have thought that there would be an enormous force of religious energy radiating in their midst as the result of the putting in motion of the engine of preaching week by week, but sometimes it must be felt that the results seemed very poor. They needed, not men who simply tried to impress their opinions upon their hearers, but who could make them feel the great things for which, presumably, we existed, and which we were here to bring somehow into consciousness. She did not wish to give the impression of criticising merely, because she owed so much to the ministers whom she had listened to; but, on the other hand, she had often heard a sermon which had no other effect than to exasperate all who listened to it. A man could not speak about God unless he had experienced Him. He must know first and foremost what religion meant in his own heart, and then he could give it to those who were thirsting in every direction for the water of life.

Mr. Nicholson (Manchester), advocated the holding of ministers' classes on Biblical criticism in order that they and their young people should know what they stood for. Continual harping on dogma was not desirable, but in many of the churches with which he was familiar nothing at all was done to enlighten the minds of the congregations as to their faith in the way it had been done by the Rev. J. J. Tayler and Mr. Thom, whose chapels he had attended as a boy.

THE REV. G. W. THOMPSON emphatically pointed out that in view of the complete changes foreshadowed by this terrible war, deep thought was required of them, not on minor matters connected with methods of organisation, but on other problems which they would have to face if they were to keep their place as a religious body. They ought to be able to show the world that their interpretation of religion covered the whole field of human life, not bearing too much on individualism or nationalism, but speaking of God to thoughtful people who at the present time were looking to the church for some message. It seemed to him that above all other things an effort should be made to get all the churches, without distinction, to express their ideal of the religious life, which could not possibly be consistent with the great conflagration now raging. If they admitted that the church had nothing to say about that, then their appeal would be weakened. The church should claim its right to be heard, and then the world would, he believed, respond in a way that it was not doing at the present time. The discussion was then adjourned until the following day.

THURSDAY MORNING.

A religious service was held on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock, conducted by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, of Nottingham, after which the discussion on the Report on Public Worship was resumed at 10.30. The Rev. Joseph Wood occupied the chair in the absence of the President, who, to his regret, had been called back to Liverpool.

The first speaker was MR. BYNG KENRICK, who said he had always been opposed to the constant testing of the religious pulse until he had been induced to give a little attention to the investigations recorded in the Report on Public Worship as a member of the Special Committee responsible for it. One of his ministerial friends had expressed the hope that he would speak about what the laity thought, to which he had replied that 99 per cent of the laity did not think, and he included himself in that number. They realised that more life was wanted, but they had the vaguest ideas as to how it was to be obtained. Now, however, as a result of these investigations, he saw that what was also wanted was a little clear thinking, and if they achieved that as a result of their discussion it would not have been in vain. He did not propose to say, either at that or any other time, what the laity thought of the ministry. Ministers had consecrated themselves to a difficult calling towards which most laymen had never taken a single step, and, therefore, the latter were not in a position to give the former fruitful advice. He would, however, emphasise the passage in which it is said that "the preacher is a messenger and a messenger implies a message." If any one took up this calling without being prepared to give his mind, energies, and time to it through life, he would say that he had better choose another vocation. Continuing, Mr. Kenrick laid special emphasis on the desirability of accustoming children to the habit of attending public worship at an early age, humorously illustrating his remarks by reminiscences of his own childhood which did not strengthen the belief that the children themselves always enjoyed going to church. He did not think it a matter on which the child's own inclination should be consulted any more than it was consulted about secular education, though, of course, particular idiosyncracies should not be ignored. The point was that not only was the discipline a good thing, but that the habit of church-going prepared in the subconscious mind a store of associations which, even after years, perhaps, of separation from those associations in later life, often asserted themselves when the time came to settle down, and renewed the connection with the church. In regard to the recommendations which the Committee had ventured to make, Mr. Kenrick said that had been done in the hope of provoking discussion, and not because they thought there was any particular wisdom in what they had set forth. There was, for instance, the suggestion about special forms of service which opened up the difficult question when, if ever, and how, might they arrive at a universal form of service for use in those churches where it was desired? If they felt there was value in being an associated group of churches, that might be a wise step to take; but perhaps there was a greater value in being a group free from external restraint. He could not help thinking, however, that if it were possible to have some form of liturgy where desired, and an open form of service where it was not desired, it would be a theoretical and practical gain. In this connection he would suggest that they were apt occasionally to magnify their prejudices into principles. They were, of course, rightly jealous of their principles, but where they could approach these delicate subjects in a spirit of co-operation that was not always shown in the past, it was desirable to do so, realising that they were actuated by nothing but the earnest wish to arrive at conclusions for the benefit of all.

THE REV. E. H. VAUGHAN, in an earnest address, said that the Church of Christ, like all other institutions, was being subjected to the supreme test of reality by the tribulations of these days. The fiery touch of war was purging it of many secular activities, and it now stood before the world purely as a religious fellowship to be judged by its divine commission of caring for the souls of men. What he wished to say about the Report under discussion centred round that passage which dealt with the supreme need of a revival of simple, earnest, spiritual religion, "and the necessity of emphasising as the fundamental purpose of the church the Worship of God and the Development of the Religious Life." This would command widespread assent, but for action it suffered from being vague and non-committal. What was needed in their churches was a whole-hearted acceptance of allegiance to Christ and a vigorous use of that loyalty in a determination to discipline our minds after the commands of his gospel. Such a purpose would redeem their worship from the unreality into which it had sunk, rescue the ministry from its growing professionalism, and the congregations from developing into mere audiences. Mr. Vaughan went on to point out that the Christian Church had always insisted on the fact that its function is worship, is in developing religious life in the members who worship; and in the wisdom of experience it had provided the means for its realisation in the ceremonies of baptism, confirmation, and the Lord's Supper. Describing these severally as instruments for the nurture of souls, and quoting from the form of words used in "that noblest of our service books, the Common Prayer for Christian Worship," he emphasised the fact that the whole scheme in its natural development centred round that fundamental attitude of the soul—loyalty to him who made the ideal of sonship real. Ignore that demand of loyalty and the church has lost its power. Hold fast to that loyalty, realise that the meaning of the church is to guard that allegiance and make it operative in daily life, and her services become radiant with light, her ordinances the very wisdom of God. Martineau saw this vision at his ordination in Dublin. He has recorded it in these moving words: "When Jesus commands I would listen as to a voice from Heaven, when he instructs I would treasure up his teaching as the words of everlasting truth, when he forewarns of evil I would take heed and fly as from impending ruin, when he comforts I would lay my head to rest as in the professed mercy of God, when he promises I would trust to his assurances as to an oracle of destiny." That was the nature of the loyalty required of them if they would take their part in the revival of religion.

MR. WIGLEY said he shared Mr. Kenrick's feeling that it was inadvisable to be always feeling their pulse, but if their condition was not satisfactory it was a good thing to ascertain what was wrong. Whatever was the cause of the decline of church attendance in other denominations, he felt it ought not to apply in theirs, for they had a rational theology and were trying to make the improvement of life the object of all their efforts. There were two main causes of a church's success or non-success—the minister and the layman. If the minister did not make his message attractive, and give to others a teaching in the prophetic spirit that was healthy, solid, and strengthening, his work would not have the effect it ought to have. As to the laymen, they did not appreciate as they ought to do the influence they might exert in the church. In regard to the training of ministers, Dr. Mellone in his address had taken what they might call the "classical side," but it was the "modern side" and the needs of to-day, both in church and Sunday School, that the Report specially dealt with. Was everything being done that ought to be done in the preparation of students to fit them for pastoral work and leadership in Sunday School life?

MR. GOMER THOMAS attributed the wholesale defection in church attendance largely to the neglect in retaining the allegiance of their boys to the Unitarian body, which, instead of being the strongest, was now about the weakest. He deprecated any attempt to wean their sons from the faith by depriving them of the liberty of worshipping in the church of their fathers.

THE REV. F. H. JONES said he thought the fundamental question was, did they think it worth while? He was much impressed by the fact that, although they were studying the desirability of attending public worship, at least one third of their number had not been present at the religious service that morning. Did they go to church for the purpose of getting or being? He thought the latter. But everybody did not want elaborate ritual, good music, &c.; some could worship better in a little bare chapel, and when Mr. Vaughan spoke of certain channels of grace being made use of, they had to ask whether anything was flowing through those channels. Such ceremonies were nothing if they became perfunctory, and were not kept up by the personal life of the minister and his people. He was an old man, but if he had to live his life over again he thought he would give himself more to his ministry, in the hope that others might be helped and strengthened by it for their work in the world.

THE REV. H. H. JOHNSON said the statistics in regard to church attendance were appalling. Half of their churches were declining, about a quarter were barely holding their own, and the other quarter were making very steady progress. But there was one thing he noticed in the report—from cover to cover neither the word "Christ" nor the word "Bible" appeared. They had got to face the situation, as he personally had faced it, that pure Theism would not work, and they must choose between that and full-blooded Christianity. They required four things—an absolute trust in God under all circumstances, a belief in Christ as the surest means through which they could attain that faith, the realisation that the Bible, if they looked into it deeply, contained all that was necessary for salvation, and a sure and certain hope of eternal life. They were going through a great crisis, and did they think that at such a time their petty little individual efforts were going to save the world? It was only in proportion as they were part of the great universal Christian Church, throbbing with its life and filled with its spirit, that they were going to help towards that end.

THE REV. J. H. WEATHERALL said that the chief cause of the decline in public worship was the fact that the people had lost interest in religion, and did not believe what the churches told them. They needed a lot of converts to freshen the life of their body, for they could not live on the past, but it was no good trying to get them unless they were sure what sort of church they really were. For his own part he could not acquiesce in the ordinary Unitarian superstition that dissent was a permanent element in English life. The effective Christian Church should be the national Church. He was an involuntary exile from the Church of England, and he hoped the day would come when, Unitarian as he was, he should be admitted freely into that communion without any implication that he was a supernaturalist or a believer in magical processes. They had not, he continued, borne sufficient witness to the fundamental condition of all religion, veracity, but it was only by their absolute veracity that they could help the Broad Church movement from the outside, and break down the barriers that kept them there. They were realising now what a grand thing it was to stand side by side with their fellow-countrymen, feeling that they belonged to them, and he could not think why they should accept the fact that where religion came in they were limited to separateness and isolation. If they definitely took the attitude of longing to have their place in the Church of England, that would help towards the restoration of religious life, and people would clearly understand and sympathise with it.

THE REV. A. A. CHARLESWORTH expressed his personal regret that they seemed to be tending towards the setting up of a new orthodoxy with authority, and that they should appear to deny that their religion was of any worth. They had been told that there was no religion for them which did not centre in Jesus. He denied that. The great issues of religion were bound up with no human personality. With Jesus he found himself in the presence of a mighty power, from whom, however, on some points, he profoundly disagreed, and it was only on the condition of that veracity that there was any hope for their own or any other form of religion.

DR. HARGROVE also expressed in emphatic terms his own personal dissent from the view that in loyalty to Christ alone lay their prospect of becoming a flourishing church. Ninety-nine out of 100 of their churches were definitely loyal to Christ, but were they all prosperous and satisfied with their condition? As a matter of fact, they did not believe in Jesus as their predecessors did, nor as orthodox people do. It might be wrong, but it was so. On the other hand they were not forbidden to revere him, though they were forbidden to declare that their religion above all consisted in loyalty to him. He wished to protest also against what Mr. Johnson had said about "pure Theism." Theism was the religion of Jesus. And what but Theism was the religion of that Prayer-Book which had been accepted by the whole Christian world? What was the religion of the Psalms but pure Theism? It was in Theism that the Jews had found their symbols of life, and it was the same faith that had kept them through eighteen centuries of dispersion and persecution a living church. What they wanted was not the denial of Theism, but a more fervent type.

This brought the discussion to a close.

ADDRESSES ON SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK.

The discussion on Sunday School work was opened at 11.15 with an address by MISS CLEPHAN, President of the Sunday School Association. It was very difficult, she said, to say anything really new about Sunday School work, and yet the question—what are we to teach, and how are we to teach it?—was always coming up, and now they were met with a new difficulty. They had been training their scholars all along in the qualities of gentleness, kindness, self-control, sweetness of disposition, and they found themselves suddenly, if not absolutely prevented from dealing with these subjects, at least unable to approach them in quite the same way. It was not easy to speak of these things, but it seemed as though they had made the mistake of using the attributes of Christ as if they were the only attributes of God. They had forgotten the God of the storm and of the whirlwind and of the devastating upheaval. They had to remember that the summer landscape was sometimes riven by an earthquake that caused more harm to life and property in a few seconds than even the great battles in which so many are now taking part. They did not say that for that reason there was anything wrong with the world or with the Creator who fashioned it. A friend had said to her in reference to this war, "Let us leave God out of it," to which she had replied, "if you do not have God here, then you do not have him anywhere." They were getting much closer to the realities of things, closer to pain and death, and they found that there was much more in these things than they had ever thought. But they no longer knew how to teach the subjects they had dealt with so glibly before. And yet, at no time were they ever free from difficulties. The Old Testament was very difficult, the New Testament was also difficult. There was always the question as to how they could keep the interest and sympathy of their scholars, and make them realise that the people they were talking to them about in Bible story were human beings with the same strength or weakness, and the same aspirations as themselves. Then they were always coming up against the question of organisation. And here she would like to say that there was a danger of mistaking the means for the end. The best methods of organisation if they did not go much further, and lead to religious and moral development, might be a ghastly thing. They had seen that in regard to the German system of education, which had been very thorough, but was applied to the wrong ends. The Sunday School method, again, must not be the same as the day school, and they must take care not to approach too closely to the secular model. Their primary object was to bring out the children's emotions, and, above all, their aspirations, and range them against evil. Miss Clephan attached great importance to the minister's class for the training of the teachers in the use of their Bibles, and to the habit of thinking continually about the lessons to be given to the scholars. Accumulated and continuous thought was the storehouse out of which they brought what they wanted to give their children at any particular moment. The importance of studying the children was also insisted on; indeed, she thought it more important that a teacher should study her children than her book; but they must not be disheartened if they did not see the fruits of their labours all at once. The young minds were not all on the same plane of ability and responsiveness, and did not progress at the same rate. With small children it was desirable that there should be constant variety and also movement during the afternoon class. Marching them round with a banner was an excellent way of relieving them from boredom and restlessness. The one thing that should be remembered above all was that there should be no attempt to mould them according to a special model. The teachers were temporarily in charge of these young souls, but from the beginning the children must be taught that their souls were their own. They could be helped and guided, but no one could live their lives for them.

THE REV. J. MORLEY MILLS, President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, pleaded that, from the point of view of the gradual evolution of the child's soul, the primary department, where the seed was sown and the work started, was the thing to concentrate on. He was greatly delighted, he said, that so much had been said during the meetings, especially by Mr. Wood and Mr. Kenrick, about the children. In the Report itself great stress was laid on the need for the adequate training of children in the homes and Sunday Schools, and it was urged that the latter should be "adapted to modern methods—better equipped, better supported, and above all made more interesting and attractive." As to the means by which this ideal might be carried out, the necessity for bright surroundings, pictures, comfortable seats, and a generally helpful environment, Mr. Morley Mills had a good deal to say, and with much energy he referred to the way in which the churches often pinch their Sunday Schools, while, at the same time, they demand the best results from them. It was a remarkable thing, he said, that Christianity practically began with the worship of a little child. The great founder of Christianity had wonderful insight into the child's nature, and he had been the leader of all who have studied it since. By means of the child should come the Kingdom of God, and there they had the attitude which the church should take towards the little ones in their midst. If they could do so sincerely and earnestly, with some comprehension of what the angel in the child, and God manifested in the flesh really meant, all the questions they were asking about the worshipfulness of the Church would be solved. But the soul in the child required the developed soul in the older individual to draw out its possibilities, and there inevitably came in the question of method. The child was an entity for a purpose of its own. It had to go through many evolutionary stages of the human race, from barbarism up to the civilised type, in its early years of mental and physical growth, but no two children were in the same evolutionary stage from the point of view of souls. This made it necessary that teaching should be adapted to the point the child had reached. There was first the primitive stage when religion must be emotional, imaginative, and centred round a personality, for instance, Jesus. Then there was the stage in which the child felt conscious of its activities, and religion was action and motion. Then the thinking period began, and reasons were required for what it was doing. Then came the recognition of the soul in charge of its body going forth to achieve its development and fulfil its mission. The Archibald system, Mr. Mills continued, was adapted to the evolutionary stages of the child's development, and this, or something like it, had come to stay. The primary school, with its expression movement, its symbolic ceremonies embodying the familiar experiences of life, and its variety of action, had effected an entire change in the method of dealing with the little ones, and the more it was brought into play the more effective it was found to be. At the other end of the scale they needed senior classes, for there should be no leaving the School when the grown-up age was arrived at. The help of the congregations was needed to enable the Sunday Schools to do their work of training souls thoroughly, and if they were well treated they could grow a church in about two generations. What was the war showing them? That materialism and intellectualism were not enough, and that religion, which gives high motives and experiences of God, was needful for spiritual life.

THE REV. J. A. PEARSON, editor of the Sunday School Monthly, said that one of the things the Sunday School Association had reason to be gratified about was that the suggestion it had made to the various Colleges had been acted upon, and experts in education had now gone to the Manchester Home Missionary College, Manchester College, Oxford, and Carmarthen College to speak to the ministers of to-morrow on the principles of religious education and the manner of applying them. When they had got the principles, and learnt a little how to put them into practice, the essential thing was to get into touch with those with whom they were working and promote a spirit of unity throughout the whole body of schools. The art of keeping in touch had been perfected by the armies in the present war, and when the young men came home again they might find that they could apply it in other directions. A great opening had been made for a new day in regard to religious teaching in the home and Sunday Schools, but they must learn to co-operate. There were too many individualists among them, and they were too apt to go each their own way. Speaking of the difficulties which the war had created, Mr. Pearson quoted from a typical letter received by him in which the writer, a superintendent, said, "Like many other schools we have suffered through the war. Four of my teachers are on active service. Two others have lost their lives. Ten of our older scholars are also on active service, so that I have been glad to obtain what help I could to carry on the work." Mr. Pearson said his sympathies went out to that man, but he congratulated him on the glorious service his Sunday School had rendered to his country. The work must, however, be continued by bringing in people who have earned their retirement and those who have not yet learnt their work. Here the task of the minister in training teachers came in. He must tell the people who did not know how what methods to adopt, and urge them to fill the vacant places. They must co-ordinate the work. There had been too much of the haphazard method in the past, and the responsibility began with the minister. The sacrifices of those who were fighting for their safety must also show them that they, too, must make greater sacrifices than ever before for the religious education of the young people, who demanded the best they could give them. What was needed was a consecrated effort, divine enthusiasm, and an immense amount of patience.

MRS. SYDNEY MARTINEAU added a few words of earnest appeal to parents, many of whom, owing partly to the idea prevalent in Unitarian circles that no one should be forced to accept another's beliefs, were inclined to shrink from pressing religious claims upon their children, the result being that the latter grew up in complete ignorance of what their position really was. At a later period, even when the parents had done all they could, there came a time when the young people wanted taking hold of, and required to be instructed by a minister on the things that parents had not been specially trained to put before them in a clear and helpful light. That made it seem desirable that something like the confirmation classes in orthodox churches should be instituted. There were difficulties about that, of course, partly owing to the uncertainty in many minds as to the practice of Communion that should follow this, and to other differences of opinion, and also owing to the fact that there might be a difficulty in many of the smaller churches in getting together at a given moment a sufficient number of boys and girls of a suitable age who could be instructed together. Mrs. Martineau was, however, of opinion that if in some of their great centres they could get a minister to deliver a series of addresses to young people, it would be a very good thing. Such a scheme might be initiated at Essex Hall, say in the Christmas holidays, and she was convinced that mothers of children would be glad to take this opportunity of sending their boys and girls to hear the religious truths their fathers believed in laid before them in such a way that, even if there were no immediate response, they would not be so likely to go afterwards to other churches for the help which they did not feel they had received in their own. She wished, however, that they could feel more sure of the message that they had to teach their children. They could never hold them unless they were absolutely sure of what they wished them to understand. If they did not regard as the first and foremost truth in their religion the Fatherhood of God, how could they expect the children to realise it? Surely this was the great principle which Christ came to teach.

THE CHAIRMAN, in a few final words, said he thought, in spite of the fact that the Conference had been called in war times, it had been one of the most helpful meetings they had yet held. First of all there had been the wonderful sermon by Dr. Jacks, secondly the still more wonderful address by Prof. Gilbert Murray. Mr. Rathbone deserved their special thanks for his address, and for the admirable way in which he had fulfilled the duties of President.

THE REV. E. D. PRIESTLEY EVANS proposed in very warm terms the following resolution:—"That the members of the Conference desire to render their sincere thanks to the President of the Conference and Mr. Ronald P. Jones, whose generosity facilitated the holding of the Triennial Meetings under very difficult circumstances; to the congregations of Essex Church and Stamford Street Chapel for the use of their buildings; to the various hosts and hostesses who have received visitors into their homes; to the local committee, and especially to the officers, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Mr. Mortimer Montgomery, and Mr. Harold Wade for their untiring and successful efforts to promote the convenience and pleasure of all who have attended the meetings.

MR. GROSVENOR TALBOT, in seconding, expressed his appreciation of the opportunities which had been given visitors from the country to form friendly relationships with their fellow-workers in London, and the great pleasure which they had received as a result of the hospitality extended to them. The meetings of this War-time Conference had been particularly helpful, and they would go away feeling that Christianity was greater and wider than they had ever conceived before. Mr. Talbot expressed the hope that the next conference would be held in Leeds, where it would be a great pleasure to return the hospitality they had received in London.

The resolution was passed with acclamation.

MRS. MARTINEAU responded to the vote of thanks in felicitous terms. It was a matter of pride to her, she said, that at a time like the present the Conference had met in London, the heart of the British Empire.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

THE Business Meeting of the Conference was held on Wednesday afternoon, October 27, at 3 o'clock, the President in the chair.

The Secretary, the Rev. J. Harwood, formally presented the Report of the Committee. The Treasurer, Mr. F. W. Monks, followed with a statement of accounts. Their finances were not, he said, in a satisfactory condition, but they never had been, and the time had now arrived when an effort should be made to alter this. Each church should take its fair share of the burden and not leave it to the Treasurer to have to make an appeal from time to time to wipe off the adverse balance.

THE PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the Report, explained the reason why the Conference had met in October instead of in April, the postponement being due to the strong feeling expressed when the time came last autumn to make the arrangements for the following spring that no one was in the mood for the Conference. Their friends in Leeds, who had invited them to hold it there, also thought it would not be quite opportune, but in tendering to them their thanks for their willingness to have them under the earlier plan he thought he betrayed no secret in saying that the invitation would be offered to them again at no very distant date. They regretted that the present meetings were taking place at a time probably inconvenient to many ministers, who were at the beginning of their autumn work, but it had been impossible to make any better arrangement. They also greatly regretted the absence of Dr. Carpenter, who was in America, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, who was unfortunately suffering from an accident, and the Rev. C. J. Street through ill-health. Reference had been made to the number of their young men who had gone to the front, and mention ought to be made also of the fact that some of their ministers had gone too, among whom he would particularly like to mention one of the older ministers, the Rev. H. D. Roberts, who was digging trenches in France, and, he understood, had never felt better. In alluding to the great loss the Conference had sustained since they last met in the death of Sir James Scott and Mr. John Harrison, two former Treasurers, Mr. Rathbone said it was, perhaps, not unfitting that he should mention one other name, that of a fellow-citizen of his who had been connected in the most modest and retiring way with their work—Mr. Philip Holt. In regard to the Report on Public Worship, which had been received with both criticism and compliments, he would say that it was criticism they wanted, and he hoped that it would stimulate earnest inquiry and effort. After some reference to other matters connected with the Report, the resolution on the agenda relating to an alteration of the rules of the Ministerial Settlements Board, the address to the churches at the beginning of the war which he, as President of the Conference, had been asked to sign, and the subsequent letter regarding temperance, Mr. Rathbone expressed his disappointment that more had not been done at that moment in the direction of real temperance reform. Another matter had come before him several times in regard to which he would only throw out a suggestion to the new President as to whether it would not be desirable, in the interests of business, to have a small executive committee which could be more quickly called together for the discussion of matters of moment in an emergency. In conclusion, the President alluded to the great achievement of the raising of £50,000 for the Sustentation Fund, and warmly congratulated those who had been chiefly instrumental in bringing about this result. The Committee felt that it was due to themselves to mark their appreciation of Mr. Harwood's labours, and it was a pleasure to him to be able to state that funds had been subscribed not only to cover the deficit referred to by Mr. Monks, but for an honorarium of £50, which he would ask Mr. Harwood to accept, and thus relieve them to some extent of their sense of indebtedness.

The resolution was seconded by the REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, who frankly said that it was a little difficult to do so as he felt somewhat detached from many of the things that had been said from time to time; but the Report was a comprehensive one, and at its conclusion it referred to the many changes that must be anticipated in the future. In spite of the possibility of being misunderstood he felt that he would not be dealing fairly either with those who were listening to him or with himself if he pretended that he was entirely happy about the future outlook, or that he could accept some of the complacent things that were being said about it. For instance, they had been talking all the morning about Unitarianism. Unitarianism interested him less and less, and he no longer called himself a Unitarian, though he would add that there was no other communion of churches that appealed to him as strongly as their own. What was going to happen to that little group of churches? They were not, he thought, going to die, they were too tough; but in spite of the many fine things said that morning he felt somehow as if he were attending a post-mortem. The idea of muffling up difficulties and controversies was paralysing. He was tired of "spirituality" and "moral values." He wanted something more concrete than that. Did they believe in the spiritual values of Christ, and were they going to stand definitely for Christianity or not? Why should Theists and Christians be boxed up in the same church, and why should they muffle up the question whether they were going forward definitely under the leadership of a personality who stood for saviourhood and judgeship of the world? He was not there to plead for any particular creed or doctrine, not even for those complacencies the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and progress upward and onward for ever. They were faced with criticisms which they would have to meet on the part of those who found no reality in their worship, and complained that their appeal left them, as a friend of his expressed it who had recently become a Roman Catholic, "absolutely icy cold." They had not got a real deep sense of what a church means as a mystical corporate fellowship. They had not got that loyalty to personality which is both binding and exacting. But they had absolute freedom, and if they added the other quality he would feel perfectly confident that they had a great future.

The Report was adopted.

THE REV. J. HARWOOD on presenting the Report of the Special Committee appointed at Birmingham for enlarging the Ministers' Sustentation Fund, reminded those present that the final statement could not, of course, be made until the next Conference, and this must, therefore, be received as an interim report. In expressing his heartfelt thanks for the gracious appreciation just shown of what had been to him a labour of love, he said that he felt it had been a privilege to take part in a work which, he hoped, would improve the prospects of their ministers.

MR. W. BYNG KENRICK moved:—That the Report of the Special Committee for enlarging the Sustentation Fund be received with best thanks to them and warmest congratulations on the signal success of their efforts, and that they be requested to remain in office until the accounts can be finally closed. He wished to explain, since he was a member of the Committee to whom thanks were given, that he only took an ordinary share in the work. The real labour had been done by others, and fitting reference to them had already been made, though words only relieved their minds and did not discharge their debt. Dealing with the steps which had been taken for the administration of the Fund and the co-operation between the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sustentation and Augmentation Committees, Mr. Kenrick said the vision and determination of the President in connection with the goal set before them had been largely instrumental in bringing about a satisfactory result. He thought they had in this large and reconstituted body as representative a body as they would be likely to get in their churches, and added that although they had complete disagreement on all sorts of points, they were in complete harmony in regard to the administration.

THE REV. W. G. TARRANT seconded the resolution, endorsing what Mr. Kenrick had said as to the complete harmony existing between the Societies represented on the Board of Managers. He referred specially to the advantages which will accrue to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as a result of the Sustentation Fund relieving it of some of its burden of responsibility, and to the future prospects of churches still in the missionary stage or making a fresh start.

MR. F. W. MONKS stated that of the original sum of £50,000 promised over £47,000 had been received. Up to July the money had already earned in interest £1,793 11s. 10d., and the final total would be over £52,000. He had received letters from several of those to whom he wrote reminding them of their promise to contribute to the Fund which were proof, not only of the effect which the war had had on the financial resources of their donors, but of the personal sacrifices which have been made in order to improve the lot of our ministers.

THE REV. W. H. DRUMMOND, in presenting the Report of the Ministers' Sustentation Fund, explained that he was only there because the real secretary was away on military duties, and he was doing the work in his absence.

The report of the National Guilds' Union was presented by the REV. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS. The Union, he said, was vigorous and growing body which was helping to draw the members of the churches into closer association with each other, and increasing the spirit of comradeship among the young people. There were thirty-four affiliated guilds, and last year they had the great joy of welcoming eight additional senior guilds and five additional junior guilds. Any organisation of young people could be registered as a guild, and affiliated, and the idea was to bring these societies together as far as possible. Distance, of course, was a great difficulty, but in certain big centres it was quite possible to have inter-guild relationship of a very valuable kind, and those who were brought into association in this way would be less likely to drop out of the church life in the difficult years between fourteen and twenty.

THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, in the absence of the Rev. C. J. Street, presented the report of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, and took the opportunity of referring to the invaluable services which Mr. Street had rendered as secretary. The late Mr. Philip Holt's splendid gift of £10,000, in addition to his previous gift of £2,000, would enable the Managers to greatly extend their benefits, and he would urge that all ministers, especially young ministers, should take advantage of the opportunity to make provision for the future. There was a special fund, established by the late Mr. John Harrison, for the purpose of assisting Ministers in the South-Eastern province, insured under the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund and in receipt of small salaries, to meet their premiums.

The report of the Social Service Union, presented by the REV. H. H. JOHNSON, lays stress on the value of the inter-denominational work done by the Union, in co-operation with other Christian bodies, in the cause of social welfare, and records the fact that the attendance of members of our own group of churches at the four successive Summer Schools at Swanwick has been considerable, 40 out of a full membership of 230 being present at the first, and over fifty out of 350 at the fourth in July last. The committee has recently sent out a questionnaire to churches on the roll of the National Conference, the replies to which it is hoped will constitute a directory of social service which will greatly facilitate the work of the Union. Some valuable replies have already been received.

DR. MELLONE moved:—That the following be added to the list of societies enumerated in Rule 7, which are entitled to elect a representative to serve on the Committee: The National Unitarian Temperance Association and the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church of Ireland. In reference to the latter part of the resolution, he said that for the first time in their history the Non-Subscribing bodies in Ireland were able to act as a corporate body, and one of the first things they had done was to raise a Sustentation Fund which, considering their numbers and resources, was not unworthy to be compared with what had been done on this side of the water. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Ellis Townley, and adopted.

It was moved by the REV. H. GOW:—That the best thanks of the Conference be given to the retiring officers and committee, and that the following officers be appointed for the ensuing three years: President, the Rev. Dr. Charles Hargrove; Vice-Presidents, Mr. James R. Beard, J.P., Sir William B. Bowring, Bart., the Rev. Dr. J. E. Carpenter, Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, F.R.I.B.A., the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone, M.A., and the Rev. Joseph Wood; Treasurer, Mr. F. W. Monks, J.P.; Auditors: Mr. G. R. Brace and Mr. C. Sydney Jones, M.A.; Secretary, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A. He was, he said, glad that Dr. Carpenter was at present in America, where he would represent England and their churches as very few other ministers could possibly do, and he paid a warm tribute to Mr. Harwood, with whose energy and effective methods he had always been impressed. In the name of the meeting he wished to say how deeply grateful they were to the retiring President, Mr. Hugh Rathbone. It was not a time when they wanted to praise even the most praiseworthy, but Mr. Rathbone, the bearer of one of the most honoured names in their body, had contributed largely by his hope and confidence to the success of the great fund which had been raised, and showed the qualities of an inspiring leader. They thanked him most warmly for his address, for the work he had done, and the example he had shown. They were most delighted to know that Dr. Hargrove was to be the next President. For years he had been one of their leading ministers, and no man had worked harder for the denomination throughout the country. They were doing an honour to themselves in electing him to be their leader for the next three years. He did not feel that he wished to discuss the future. He thought Mr. Lloyd Thomas in his speech had not distinguished between what he called "muffling up" difficulties, and their being swallowed up of life in the presence of a great situation such as they were faced with at the present time. It was as impossible for them to forecast the future and make plans for it as it was impossible to forecast the future of Europe. They were in the thick of the fight, and the less anxious they were to predict what was to come the more determined they were to stand shoulder to shoulder for the big unifying cause. The importance of religion at the present time was that it should help them to bear themselves worthily, and be able to endure their almost overwhelming troubles.

DR. BLAKE ODGERS cordially seconded the resolution, referring to Dr. Hargrove as one who had suffered for truth and never ceased fearlessly to express it, and whom it would be an honour to have as their President.

The retiring President warmly thanked the meeting for the kind words of appreciation that had been spoken, and called upon Dr. Hargrove, who was accorded an enthusiastic welcome.

DR. HARGROVE expressed his appreciation of the honour which had been conferred upon him, but as one not only old, but the oldest man who had ever occupied that position, he could not but feel that it was impossible for him to hope to do as much as his predecessors. Seventy-five was not the prime of life, and three years added to that would make some difference, but they could count on him to do all in his power, and he hoped the cause would not suffer in his hands.

Dr. Hargrove then moved: That the following representatives of the Conference be appointed to the Board of Managers of the Sustentation Fund for the next three years: The Revs. C. J. Street and Joseph Wood, Messrs. G. H. Leigh, F. W. Monks, H. R. Rathbone, and J. Harrop White. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Thew and carried.

MR. RONALD P. JONES moved:—That the recommendations of the Committee (Report, page 14) authorising the Ministerial Settlements Board, in making recommendations of Ministers, to select not only from its own list, but from the list in the Essex Hall Year Book, be adopted. Their approval of this resolution, he said, really depended on whether they wished the Board to be of use to all the churches, instead of, as hitherto, to a limited number only, and whether, secondly, they wished to authorise their own appointed representatives to give the same advice officially as to settlements which had hitherto been given unofficially by certain qualified individuals in a way that must be perfectly well known to them all. He pointed out that after several years' experience the Board had concluded that the existing area of choice in making recommendations prevented their being of real service, except to a limited number of churches. All they could do now was to recommend names from their list of ministers who were unoccupied already, or had stated that they wished to leave their present pulpits, and very often they suggested names knowing all along that they were not really so suitable for the vacancy as other men who had not actually expressed a wish to move, but who would be quite willing to accept a definite invitation to go to some particular place. There were certain men who knew something about practically the whole of the ministry who were usually consulted in such cases, and most of the pulpits were filled in that way; but what the Board now asked was that they should be authorised to suggest names from the whole list of ministers in the Year Book in their collective and official capacity.

THE REV. DENDY AGATE pointed out that all these alterations in the method of their working were more or less experimental. The present system was satisfactory up to a certain point, but it did not help all the congregations in the best way, and if these enlarged powers were given to the Board, they would be able to say at the next Triennial Meeting how the change had worked.

Dr. Blake Odgers as a member of the Board cordially welcomed the alteration, and asked the meeting to vote for it.

THE REV. W. H. DRUMMOND urged that this was a matter of such importance that he did not think it ought to be rushed through without any discussion. What they were proposing to do was to establish a board of patronage. He thought there were dangers in that direction which they ought to guard against. He suggested that if they carried the resolution the members of the Board should be elected triennially, that there should be fresh blood constantly coming upon it, and that it should represent adequately different parts of the country. They had tried to do this on the Sustentation Fund, and local knowledge was of the essence of its method, and if this Board was going to have such far-reaching powers it ought to be on the basis that all the local Associations should be represented, absolutely excluding any possibility of the ministers feeling that some were in favour with the Board and some were not.

THE REV. A. A. CHARLESWORTH emphatically endorsed the remarks of the last speaker. He was opposed to the introduction of ecclesiastical authority and to the idea of going behind ministers' backs and making suggestions to other churches about them. The matter ought not to be rushed through at the end of the proceedings.

MR. RATHBONE said there was no question whatever of patronage. Their only object was to enable the Board to make suggestions which at present they could not make, and widen the scope of their help. He would, however, be quite in favour of their making some arrangement by which fresh blood might be introduced.

THE REV. J. HARWOOD read extracts from letters written by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson and the Rev. C. J. Street bearing on the matter, and pointing out the necessity for some fresh method, and went on to say that the Board was representative already in the way Mr. Drummond had suggested. The whole of England and Wales was covered by advisory committees, and a representative of the district from which a request came always took part in the recommendations.

No amendment being proposed, the resolution was carried.

This concluded the business.

The following are the names of the new Committee:—

Rev. John Ellis, Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, Rev. F. K. Freeston, Rev. Henry Gow, B.A., Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, Rev. W. W. C. Pope, Rev. H. D. Roberts, Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., Mr. A. S. Thew, Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Mr. J. Wigley, Miss M. K. Winsor.

THE MINISTERIAL SETTLEMENTS BOARD.

SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT.

THE last ministerial application entered on the Board's list was No. 129, and the last congregational application No. 88. This gives an average per annum since the Board commenced operations about five and a half years ago of 23.5 ministers and sixteen congregations. The number for the last twelve months are only seventeen ministers and six congregations. Two causes have brought about this large reduction, especially in the number of congregations. In the first place the war seems to have the effect of causing an unwillingness to disturb existing relations between congregations and their ministers. In the second place the change of rule made a year ago which restricts the Board to giving recommendations must obviously reduce the number of both ministers and congregations desiring to avail themselves of its services. It does not necessarily follow that the usefulness of the Board is diminished in the same proportion because some results are avoided which experience had proved to be undesirable. If the recommendation made by the Board last year, and subsequently agreed to by the Conference Committee is adopted by the Conference itself, allowing for a wider area of choice in giving advice to congregations, it may reasonably be expected that congregations, without losing anything of their liberty, will have at their disposal much more valuable assistance than hitherto, and that many faithful ministers who do not care to place their names on an official list, may be enabled to make a change which, though they would not seek it, would be both welcome and beneficial.

During the year ten ministers and twelve congregations on the lists have effected settlements. At the close there are on the books twenty five ministers and five congregations as compared with twenty-two and twelve respectively at the beginning.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is one of M. Vandervelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depôts for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

A COUNCIL meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held on Tuesday, Oct. 26, Mr. C. F. Pearson presiding. There were present Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke (Treasurer), Rev. W. G. Tarrant (Chairman of Committee), and Mrs. L. M. Aspland, Mrs. Bartram, Miss Burkitt, Rev. Rudolf Davis, Rev. V. D. Davis, Rev. D. Delta Evans, Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, Rev. Dr. C. A. Greaves, Rev. Dr. Charles Hargrove, Miss Florence Hill, Miss E. C. Lake, Miss L. Martineau, Mrs. Sydney Martineau, Rev. Dr. S. H. Mellone, Mr. F. W. Monks, Mr. G. J. Notcutt, Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. Charles Roper, Mr. J. Sudbery, Miss Tagart, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, Miss Tayler, Rev. H. S. Tayler, Mr. T. B. Taylor, Mr. F. W. Turner, Dr. A. D. Tyssen, Mr. L. N. Williams, Rev. A. W. Wooding, Mr. T. Pallister Young, Mr. G. E. Verity, Rev. T. P. Spedding, Missionary Agent; Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Secretary.

The Secretary, the Rev. W. C. Bowie, read the report, some extracts from which are given below. The first part of the report relates chiefly to matters connected with the grant-aided churches and the work of the District Associations which have been largely dealt with in these columns already.

PROVINCIAL MEETINGS.

There was some divergence of opinion on the part of the Committee as to the advisability of holding autumnal meetings of the Association this year, because of the difficulties resulting from the war. The very cordial invitation of the Minister and congregation at Mexborough, along with that of the Sheffield and District Association, proved irresistible, and arrangements are now in progress for holding the Provincial Meetings at Mexborough on Wednesday and Thursday, November 24 and 25. The representatives of the Association are assured of a hearty welcome, and largely attended and enthusiastic meetings are anticipated.

PUBLICATIONS.

In addition to the Handbooks by Dr. S. A. Mellor, Rev. H. D. Roberts, Rev. H. McLachlan, and Rev. R. Nicol Cross, already published, the following new volumes are in the press:—'Jesus and Christianity in the Twentieth Century,' by Rev. Alfred Hall; 'The Divine in Art and in Literature,' by Rev. W. L. Schroeder; 'Revelations of God in Nature and in Man,' by Dr. E. Thackray. These additional volumes it is hoped to publish before Christmas this year. The Rev. C. J. Street has revised and prepared for the press a series of addresses by his late father, the Rev. James C. Street, on 'What I Believe'—about God, Man, Religion, the Future Life, the Bible, Christ, Heaven. The Committee believe that the addresses will prove very helpful to many readers, especially to those who are breaking away from orthodox beliefs and who are seeking a larger and truer faith. For the nine months ending September 30, 1915, grants of books and tracts have been made at home and abroad as follows:—Home, 1,781 books and 22,034 tracts, valued at £159;

Colonial and Foreign, 207 books and 6,463 tracts, valued at £34. Naturally, applications from abroad are fewer than in pre-war days. The secretaries of congregations have had sent to them a small packet of Unitarian literature, with a list of tracts and an application form for a grant for free distribution. The 'Hymns in Times of National Crisis,' and the 'War Time Leaflets' issued by the Association, have been used by several congregations, but not so widely as the Committee had hoped.

COLONIAL AND FOREIGN WORK.

In many ways the blight of the war has affected the Colonial and Foreign work of the Association far more deeply than at home. South Africa, especially Johannesburg, is a difficult field of labour for a Unitarian minister at any time; but during the war there were peculiar dangers as well as difficulties to contend with, and it is not, perhaps, surprising that the Rev. R. J. Hall and the congregation found it incumbent upon them to part company. The honestly held opinions and sentiments of the pulpit and the pew apparently passed beyond agreement or reconciliation. Mr. Hall's engagement has ended; meanwhile, members of the congregation are themselves conducting the Sunday services. It is hoped that in due course a minister will again be appointed to take charge of the important missionary work at Johannesburg.

At Timaru, New Zealand, the anti-war views of the minister, the Rev. J. H. G. Chapple, led to a rupture with the congregation, and almost created a riot in the town. Mr. Chapple resigned, and, with his large family, he has removed to the Pacific Coast, United States of America. While the committee very properly refrain from passing judgment on the action of the minister or the congregation in a time of serious crisis and trouble, they would place on record their appreciation of the missionary enterprise and labours of Mr. Chapple at Timaru in pre-war days; a convert from orthodoxy, he became a vigorous and undaunted champion of the principles and faith of Unitarianism in New Zealand.

In consequence of the Rev. W. F. Kennedy having, early in September, undertaken certain duties in connection with the wounded soldiers who have returned from the field of battle to New Zealand, the Unitarian services conducted by him at Dunedin during the past three years have been discontinued for the present.

The financial crisis and the lack of remunerative employment in Canada, particularly in the West and on the Pacific Coast, have very seriously depressed the Unitarian congregations, several of them having not yet succeeded in planting their roots very firmly in the ground. Dr. S. M. Crothers and other representatives of the American Unitarian Association on their way to the Conference of Unitarian Churches at San Francisco, visited Winnipeg, Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, and Victoria. The following resolution was submitted to the Conference by the Rev. W. F. Greenman:—

"We, 260 Unitarians, have passed through Canada from Montreal to the Pacific. We have been deeply impressed by what has already been accomplished, and by the vast possibilities of the future. We realise as never before the significance of the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the American Unitarian Association, and the Canadian Unitarian Association, in founding churches in the leading cities of the country. We have but few churches in a great country. We have met the members of these churches whose spirit may be expressed in the words of Gov. Bradford, speaking of the Pilgrim Fathers: 'We have a great hope and inward zeal for laying good foundations.' Our new churches are bravely passing through a severe crisis during the great war. We recommend to the General Conference of Unitarian Churches meeting in San Francisco to appoint a committee to act in co-operation with the American Unitarian Association to raise a special additional fund adequate to carry on the work already begun till the return of normal conditions in Canada."

An influential Committee was accordingly appointed, and the Directors of the American Unitarian Association at their last meeting in Boston responded by adopting the following resolution:—

"Whereas the directors of the American Unitarian Association have heard with great satisfaction of the appointment by the General Conference at its meeting in San Francisco, of a special committee to call the attention of Unitarians throughout the country to the pressing needs of the Unitarian churches in the Dominion of Canada, and to raise funds in aid of these Societies, it is hereby

"Voted, to pledge the cordial co-operation of the directors to the efforts of this special committee and to commend its object to the generosity of all Unitarians."

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association for the current year is making grants as follows to Unitarian churches in Western Canada: Winnipeg, £50; Edmonton, £50; Vancouver, £50; Victoria, £60.

Dr. Carpenter is now in America delivering courses of lectures at a number of colleges and universities in the United States, taking as his subjects, 'Phases of Early Christianity,' and some special aspects of 'Comparative Religion.' He will preach in several Unitarian churches, and, as far as the time at his disposal will permit, attend some meetings organised by the American Unitarian Association. Dr. Carpenter has been asked by the Committee of the Association to convey the greetings and cordial good wishes of the Unitarians of this country to their brethren in America.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND TRUSTS.

Difficulties have arisen in respect to the Trust Deeds and Endowments of some of the old General Baptist Chapels which for a great many years past have been associated with Unitarians; a Conference was arranged, first between representatives of the Baptist Union, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and afterwards with the officers and Committee of the General Baptist Assembly. Meetings were held extending over several months, and in the end a general agreement was reached which was accepted by the three bodies concerned—subject to the approval of the individual congregations and of the Charity Commissioners.

A draft scheme, embodying the agreement, has been prepared, and this will be further considered. Meanwhile, the Charity Commissioners, having been approached, recommended that formal application to them be deferred until the conclusion of the war as there was no likelihood of obtaining Parliamentary sanction before that time.

The Chairman of the Civil Rights Committee, Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., and the other representatives of the Association have devoted a great deal of time and thought and labour to the difficult and somewhat perplexing problems which the study of ancient trust deeds necessarily presents. The agreement reached by the representatives of the Baptist Union, the General Baptist Assembly, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association gives promise of a peaceful and permanent settlement, and a satisfactory adjustment of the differences which had arisen.

INCORPORATION OF THE ASSOCIATION.

At the Annual Meeting held at Whitsuntide, 1914, a resolution was adopted authorising the Committee to take the necessary legal steps for securing the Incorporation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Members of the Committee belonging to the legal profession rendered useful assistance in the preparation of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, and they had the great advantage of the advice and criticism of Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, a former President of the Association, whose knowledge and large experience were invaluable. The officials of the Board of Trade were also most courteous and helpful in their examination of the draft submitted to them for approval.

The licence by the Board of Trade was issued July 21, 1915, and the Certificate of Incorporation July 28, 1915. The Association is licensed under Section 20 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. It is specially provided as a condition of granting the licence, that no portion of the income shall be paid or transferred by way of profit to any member of the Association.

On the financial side, the chief advantage of incorporation is that it obviates the trouble and expense incurred in transferring investments on the death or resignation of a trustee. It places the responsibility of trusteeship upon the officers and committee as a whole, instead of upon two or three individuals, and it provides for a continuous living body of trustees elected annually by the members of the Association.

Another important advantage is that the Incorporated Association may be appointed Trustee of Chapels, schools, and property held in connection therewith. At the present time the Secretary of the Association is a Trustee of twenty or more chapels in different parts of the country, and several members of the Committee have been appointed in a similar way at the request of congregations. In future, instead of appointing an individual, congregations, if they so desire, may appoint the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (Incorporated) as Trustee. The appointment of the Association as Trustee will, it is believed, often prove an important safeguard in protecting the rights and interests of congregations from neglect or maladministration.

The Civil Rights Committee have, again and again, had some very striking examples of [the trouble, expense, and loss incurred by congregations in not having a responsible and experienced body of trustees. It need hardly be pointed out that a Trustee, whether an individual or a corporate body, has no power to alter or assign a trust; a trustee is only an administrator. In granting the Licence to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, it is expressly stipulated that incorporation "shall not diminish or impair any control or authority exercisable by the Chancery Division, the Charity Commissioners, or the Board of Education."

The Committee are indebted to Mr. Ronald P. Jones for designing the Seal of the Incorporated Association, with the words "Faith, Fellowship, Freedom" inscribed as its motto.

The reading of the report was followed by a short discussion, and a special word of thanks was given to Mr. Bowie by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant for all the extra trouble and work which he had incurred in arranging the Conference with the General Baptists and securing the Incorporation of the Association.

The report was adopted and the proceedings closed.

THE DREWS LECTURE ON IMMORTALITY.

At the invitation of the Congregational Body this lecture was delivered by the Rev. W. Temple, of St. James's, Piccadilly, at the Memorial Hall on Friday evening, October 22. The chair was taken by Principal Forsyth, who explained that the lecture was founded about ten years ago by Mr. Drews in memory of his wife.

The Rev. W. Temple said it gave him great pleasure to respond to the honour conferred upon him as he thought that so far as possible all Christians should co-operate together without in any way being untrue to any positions they may hold dear. Upon such an important occasion, perhaps, he ought to have written every word, but he had not done so. The first part of his lecture, for which, perhaps, he cared least, was written out, but the second part, for which he cared most, he had not committed to paper as he generally found that his best thoughts came when he was face to face with his audience. Philosophy, he said, was the endeavour to understand experience, it assumed that the universe was reasonable. If it believes in God it is the conclusion arrived at by an inferential process. But religion is not a discovery, it is an attitude, and its belief in God is independent of philosophy. Christ is an act of God, He is the eternal wisdom in manifestation. Philosophy works inward, theology works outward. Immortality is proved by religion, not by philosophy; it is founded upon a belief in God. Faith cannot rest on evidence because evidence rests on faith. Mysticism is experience brought to a focus. The lecturer then referred at length to the teachings of Plato and Kant, but suggested that at most from their positions immortality could not be more than a postulate. But for the life of Christ he should venture to say that Zeus had not revealed himself. The teachings of psychology only appealed to a few, and with regard to the claims of modern Spiritualism, of which he desired to speak with respect, they must recognise that the experiences on which it was based were not general.

His main position was based on the faith that God is love, and love is bestowed on individuals. God loves me, and, therefore, He will not let me perish. The only argument that Christ appears to have offered on the subject was in the words, "God is not the God of the dead but of the living." In this connection he mentioned an incident in his father's life. In reply to an anxious inquirer the latter said, "I am so sure that God loves me that I do not bother about it."

Dwelling briefly on the thought of eternity he mentioned Bergson's teaching, and maintained that our richest experiences were those that united the past with the present, and, perhaps, penetrated somewhat into the future. But omniscience was a divine faculty; perhaps our clearest conception of it would come if we imagined ourselves witnessing a play which was quite familiar to us by reading or by former visits; we knew every incident and what the end would be, and yet our thoughts were fixed on what was transpiring at the moment. Altogether we knew very little, perhaps it was good for us not to know more, otherwise our attention might be diverted from our present duty, which was to love and serve God.

While the address was interesting the lecture can hardly be said to have covered the whole ground. He drew no analysis from nature, no inductions from science, made no reference to the teachings of Ancient Egypt, nor to the profound beliefs amongst Eastern nations to-day. E. C.

THE Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association acknowledges the receipt of 13s. 6d. "Conscience Money."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bootle.—A Liverpool correspondent writes: "A reference in last week's INQUIRER to the action of the Rev. W. Short, B.A., in joining the forces, has made many of us thoughtful. Those who are privileged to a more personal intimacy are aware that simple duty is the mainspring of the whole matter. There were a hundred and one reasons for staying at home. A life full of the intensest activity of private and public service might well prompt satisfaction with present conditions. Nay, it might be argued that military service would be in the direction of limitation of usefulness. And against all such pleading the 'still small voice' has prevailed. One can only say that this 'sermon in concrete' is by far the most eloquent and convincing appeal ever uttered from Mr. Short's pulpit. He has 'built greater than he knew.'"

Bury.—On October 31st the Rev. W. H. Drummond visited Bury on behalf of the Belgian Hospital Fund. At both services he described the work that has been done and made an earnest plea for further help. Visitors were present from the neighbouring churches at Chesham, Stand, and Heywood. Much help has come already from this district and this has been substantially increased by the excellent offertories last Sunday, which amounted to £18.

Deptford.—An earnest appeal has been made on behalf of the trustees and congregation of the Deptford General Baptist (Unitarian) Chapel for donations to a fund which is being raised to save it from destruction. The building was founded in 1674, and has many historic associations. Some notable men have worshipped in it, including Thomas Hollis, Milner Gibson, and Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield). In the graveyard lie buried the bodies of the secretary of Oliver Cromwell and the parents of Sir John Bennett, the famous watchmaker of Cheapside. Dew's 'History of Deptford' gives the following details: "Two chapels are supposed to have been erected during the reign of Charles II., one in Butt Lane by a small congregation of Quakers and the other in Church Street by a Society of General Baptists. Mr. Evelyn who was a loyal churchman refers to the latter place when describing the state of affairs in the Declaration of Indulgence granted by James II. and then follows the extract, 1687, April 10th: 'In this last week there was a wonderful concourse of people at the Dissenters' Meetinghouse in this Parish and the Parish Church (St. Nicholas, Deptford) left exceedingly thin. What this will end in God Almighty only knows.'" Towards the latter end of the eighteenth century it is supposed that the chapel in Church Street was reduced in size by the removal of a third of the building and the demolition of the galleries. The wall at the back of the chapel was evidently built by men acquainted with ship-building, for there are two beams running from floor to ceiling, and the brickwork was placed between these thus dividing the wall into three panels. The corners were not bound together. Some twenty-five years ago the Rev. Robert Spears was instrumental in having certain repairs carried out, and these seem to have been the only repairs attempted within the last hundred years. Of late there has been a marked revival in the work of the chapel under the leadership of Mr. E. A. Carlier, and, while those whom it serves are of the poorest class, they are able to pay their way, largely because Mr. Carlier receives no salary from the congregation. A few weeks ago the Trustees were served with a notice from the London County Council condemning the building as structurally unsafe, and requiring immediate and extensive repairs and rebuilding as an alternative to its being entirely demolished. To meet the cost of absolutely necessary alteration it was realised that a sum of £700 would be required, and towards this £603 13s. 6d. has now been received. Further contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Treasurer of the Deptford Fund, Mr. F. C. Creak, Fernwood, North Hill, Highgate, N., or the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, 4, Ella Road, Crouch Hill, N. The work of restoration is being carried out by Messrs. T. Chatfield Clarke & Sons, architects and surveyors. The contractors are Messrs. Hall, Bedall & Co.

Leeds.—The Mill Hill Chapel Record for November contains the following 'Parting Words' from the Rev. R. Nicol Cross:—

"It is just two years now since I came among you as your Minister, and, on looking back over that period, I have much to be thankful for. First and foremost is the assurance which has come to me recently both from members of the church and some who are not members, that I have not laboured entirely in vain among you, but that in that which is the truest gauge of spiritual ministry, in inspiration, consolation, and helpfulness, the services at Mill

Hill have continued to be fruitful. All the way along some one would come at the end of worship and quietly thank me for good received; but it is only within the last week that I have realised the value to many of our church and its worship. For that I am thankful.

"I have not been particularly demonstrative, and do not like the flattery by which sometimes ecclesiastical machinery is well oiled, but I can say now that it has been a continual joy to me to look round and see the faithful and untiring labours in the church's work of many of you. A Christian who makes no sacrifice and does nothing for the good of others, somehow, somewhere, is a contradiction in terms, if he exists; but our congregation is rich in those whose example will be part of the fine tradition of the place as long as it endures. The only question that troubles my joy as I think of these is—shall we see their like again? Is the mould still unbroken? But I am happier about that since this terrific national trial came upon us. Sanguis martyrum semen ecclesiae."

"For personal kindness also and sympathy in my task, I cannot but be grateful. I have had no regrets on that score about coming among you. I am only sorry that the limitations on pastoral work in a prominent city church have prevented as full a cultivation of the more private and domestic side of my ministry as I could wish. Especially, there is a fine lot of boys among us who have been attending public schools—some of them now in the great army of England—generous spirited youths, whom I should have liked to know more intimately for the sake of personal influence, and to my own good. Them, above all, I should have liked to enthrone with spiritual ideals. The church and God's Kingdom is to me the greatest crusade of existence, the most glorious chivalry of human nature, the highest consecration and the noblest dream of youth in this world. For all that is finest, best, and fairest in them I would now throw back the responsibility on their parents. No church can fulfil the mission of the home. Forgive the humour of my leaving with you the words of Thomas Carlyle, which had to do duty as his valedictory address to the undergrads of the University of Edinburgh: 'Bid them in my name fight the good fight, and quit themselves like men, in the warfare, to which they are as if conscript and consecrated, and which lies ahead. Tell them to consult the eternal oracles... May they love Wisdom, as Wisdom, if she is to yield her treasures, must be loved—piously, valiantly, humbly, beyond life itself, or the prizes of life, with all one's heart and all one's soul—in that case, and not in any other case, it shall be well with them.'

"Further, I desire to thank the committee and congregation for their readiness to release me in order to answer what seems at the moment to be the more urgent call. I do not think it will be loss in the end, whatever the sacrifice and inconvenience at present. I go to a work in the R.A.M.C. in the midst of one of the greatest wars of history, a work essentially Christian and humanitarian, which will appeal for ever to the imagination if ministers and churches throughout the land will rise to it. I'd like to see a third of the pulpits of England empty while the parsons throw off their robes and collars, and with nothing about them but their manhood and the khaki with the Red Cross on it, lay on themselves the lowliest duties of the stricken field, and hand the cup of cold water where brave men thirst.

"For months I have seen the young men, your sons, pass one by one out of our church and school to the Army and the Field, to face dangers and wounds; even the girls have been going to nurse in Hospitals. Is my place just now by their side or yours? Many congratulations and expressions of good will, the first received being from our Minister-Emeritus, encourage me to think that I have done the right thing.

"Finally, it goes without saying that the keenest sacrifice in my going is not mine, but Mrs. Cross's. She has said nothing to dissuade me, and I am glad, as far as kindly hospitality can do it, the pain of parting will be softened for her. For the present her address will be, Burley Hill, Leeds.

"Au revoir. Do not let the Church fall from the position it has won, by any indifference and ease. Keep school and institutions running well. It is a great time for all. And may the blessing of the Church's supreme Head be with you."

Norwich.—The late Mr. James Mottram.—The Calendar of the Octagon Chapel for November contains the following tribute to the memory of Mr. James Mottram:—

"With feelings of the deepest regret we have to record the passing away of one of our oldest and most faithful members, Mr. James Mottram, who died on Friday, October 22nd, at the advanced age of 81. A well-known and highly respected citizen of Norwich, he was best known to us as a constant attendant at our Sunday services in the Octagon Chapel, whose welfare he sought to promote through the best years of a long life. Of all institutions in this city, and he was interested in many, the Octagon Chapel was most endeared to him because it was the temple of his fathers, and in it was set forth that type of liberal Christianity which Mr. Mottram in his own life honoured and upheld. Through good days and through evil days, he never wavered in his loyalty, and his constant presence in the congregation, even when the weight of years began to tell, was an example to us all and a constant rebuke to laxity in worship and in prayer. The Octagon Chapel has been richly blest with men of sterling worth, and their spirit still remains and should fill us with more reverent feelings and thoughts every time we enter the house of prayer. Surely if any people are able to run with patience the race that is set before them, it is we who worship week by week in the presence of so great a cloud of witnesses, we who are linked up with so great a company of noble spirits. Thankful for the life which has just closed, may we feel even in our sorrow that the link with these holy ones is strengthened, and may we endeavour to gain something of their spirit of loyalty and faithfulness."

Tenterden.—The late Lady Talbot.—The Kent Messenger, recording with regret the death of Lady Talbot, observes in its issue for October 30th that the deceased lady was well known and greatly respected in Tenterden. She was a native of that ancient borough, and a member of a family connected with the Old Meeting House for many generations. Her eldest surviving brother, Mr. Edgar Winsor, J.P., is one of the Senior Trustees. Sir William Henry Talbot was also connected with Tenterden in early life, for his half-brother with whom he lived in his youth was the Rev. Edward Talbot, for many years the respected minister of the Old Meeting House. At the morning service on Sunday, October 24th, after a sermon from the text: "Endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," Mr. Rylett said it was a comforting reflection that although we sometimes thought the limits of intimacy were already reached here, yet as a fact that intimacy became greater when our friends had passed beyond the veil. We then learned that spiritual intimacy had, indeed, no limits. Their dear friend Lady Talbot had a strong spiritual relationship with that congregation. She had taught in their Sunday School and many still felt the spell of her sweet ministry. One who passed away before her gave a remarkable testimony to her loving influence. A pansy fell from the bridal bouquet of Lady Talbot, and one of her scholars preserved it in her Bible for fifty years and sent it to her old teacher as a golden-wedding gift. The gracious spirit, to which this simple and beautiful incident testified, pervaded the whole life of Lady Talbot. In the great city of Manchester she enjoyed universal esteem. The duties that fell to her as the wife of an eminent citizen and distinguished public servant were discharged with a devotion, a fineness of spirit and a tact that commanded the admiration of all who were privileged to know her. The Old Meeting House, of course, was especially dear to her. That was her old home, as it was her honoured husband's, and she always turned to it with joy. He had known nothing more inspiring than the sight of her sweet spiritual face, as now and again she sat in her accustomed place between her venerable husband and her beloved son, Mr. Hugo Talbot, the Town Clerk of Brighton, and he rejoiced to think that though her bodily presence was now denied them, their spiritual relationship was more intimate than ever. She had left them with benediction, and they called her blessed. The order of service closely followed that of the funeral service at Cross Street Chapel, Manchester, on the previous Wednesday, the same hymns being sung. At the close, Chopin's 'Dead March' was played with great impressiveness by Mrs. Hermitage, the organist, the congregation standing. The clematis which grows on the front of the Old Manor House (one of the most picturesque residences in Tenterden and now occupied by Mr. Walter Thomson, another of the Senior Trustees of the Old Meeting House) was struck from a piece of the clematis in the bridal bouquet of Lady Talbot.

Urmston.—Anniversary Services to celebrate the completion of twenty-one years of Unitarian work and worship in Urmston were conducted on Sunday, October 31st, by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., under whose guidance and ministry the church was set on its way. The record of subsequent years is one of varying fortune and hopeful experiment, and, whilst substantial aid still has to be afforded by the local association, it is satisfactory to note that the congregation needs to rely less upon extraneous financial support than has been the case for some years. The services were well attended, and in other respects encouraging. On the previous evening a reunion of past and present members of the school and church took place. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. Dendy Agate, J. M. Mills, Chas. Peach, and Messrs. G. H. Leigh, G. W. Henshall, and H. R. Nuttall. Mr. W. Canning occupied the chair.

Victoria, B.C.—The Rev. H. E. B. Speight has accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the First Unitarian Church, Berkeley, California. Mr. Speight has been in charge of the church at Victoria for a year, and for the past eight months has also travelled every Sunday to Vancouver—a steamer trip of over eighty miles—to conduct evening service there. Berkeley is the seat of the University of California, with its 8,500 students, and the congregation of the Unitarian Church (the only self-supporting "college-town" church of Unitarian persuasion in the U.S.A.) is largely composed of professors and students from the University. At Berkeley is also the Pacific Unitarian School for the Ministry, over which the Rev. Earl M. Wilbur, D.D., presides. Mr. Speight began his ministry at Berkeley on October 31st.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

'THE ENGLISHWOMAN' EXHIBITION.

The Fifth Annual Exhibition of Arts and Handicrafts which is being organised by The Englishwoman, promises to be of exceptional interest. It will be held at the Central Hall, Westminster, from November 17 to 27, and will be opened by the Marchioness of Londonderry. Women handicraft workers have been amongst the worst sufferers from war conditions, and, at a time when so much that is beautiful is being destroyed, those who are able should make an effort to foster the creative spirit wherever it seeks expression and thus help to restore the joy of life. The exhibits are said to be of great beauty and variety, and include specimens of book-binding, pottery, sculpture, wood carving, needle-work, enamelled glass, and toy-making. All these wares are suitable for Christmas and New Year gifts, and purchasers will have the satisfaction of knowing that they are performing a real national service by helping to support our home crafts and industries at a time of exceptional difficulty.

THE POSITIVIST APOSTLES.

The Positivist Movement, once so active in English public life, is now almost extinct; The Manchester Guardian, indeed, speaks of Mr. Frederic Harrison, who is well on in the eighties, as "a solitary survivor." The late Sir Henry Cotton, whose sympathy with Indian aspirations is so gratefully remembered by the Indian public, was a member of the Positivist body, having joined mainly under the influence of Richard Congreve, and we understand that, owing to a peculiar rule of the Church of Humanity, the memorial service which was announced for last Sunday cannot be held till three weeks after the funeral. Dr. Richard Congreve, who has long been dead, was a friend of George Eliot. He led the "Emotionals" against the "Intellectuals," and when the split came Sir Henry Cotton remained with Dr. Congreve's section.

'THE LIBERAL CHRISTIAN.'

The Liberal Christian is a new monthly journal which has been launched partly as the organ of the Liberal Christian League, but also to fulfil a useful mission among those who are feeling after the larger faith, and who are really members of the League in spirit. The first number contains an article on 'Social Service in a War-Relation,' by Miss A. H. Alleyne, Hon. Secretary of the Liberal Christian League; a contribution by the Rev. Cavendish Moxon, an Anglican clergyman, on 'The Liberal Christian Opportunity'; an address on 'Christianity and the War,' by Dr. J. Glasse, and items of news 'From Headquarters.' Dr. Glasse, it should be mentioned, is the new President of the League in succession to Archdeacon Lilley. As it is not possible to hold the usual Autumn Meetings this year, members will not have the pleasure of hearing his Presidential address, and this contribution to The Liberal Christian takes its place. Much gratitude is expressed to Dr. Drummond, the President of 1913-14, who during Archdeacon Lilley's illness this year kindly consented to remain as Acting-President.

A HEADMASTER'S MEMORIES.

Bishop Welldon's book of reminiscences entitled 'Recollections and Reflections,' is full of entertaining matter, and he enlivens the discussion of such subjects as religious instruction, the teaching of Greek and Latin, and the place of athletics in education with a fund of amusing stories. Here is one illustrating the difficulty which often confronts a teacher who thinks he has made a simple fact perfectly clear. "A witty schoolmaster whom I knew well," says Dr. Welldon, "used to relate the story of a governess who tried to give her pupils some idea of the relative size of distant countries by saying, 'Cambodia is about as large as Siam,' but when this information was reproduced in a written exercise, one of the girls put it in the words, 'She says Cambodia is about as large as she is.'"

We cannot resist quoting also the following from a group of anecdotes dealing with Lancashire and Lancashire characteristics:—"A good many years ago a high ecclesiastic who prided himself, it is said, upon the dignity of his episcopal office, observed a porter at one of the railway stations saluting him, as he thought, by raising his cap with a deferential air. He walked up to the porter, and told him how glad he was to see such a recognition of his office in the national Church. 'It is particularly gratifying,' he added, 'as coming from a working man.' The only reply of the porter was to say in a gruff tone, as he turned away, 'Lord bless you, sir, I was only scratchin' my 'ead.'"

IN MEMORY OF MRS. DEARMER.

A letter has appeared in the press signed by one of the late Mrs. Dearmer's many friends expressing the feeling that her act of heroic sacrifice should be commemorated in some suitable manner. "Already we are beginning to hear," she says, "of the deep impression made by the tragic circumstances of her death on the Serbian people. We feel that it is only fitting that a name held in such high honour by the country in which she died should also be commemorated in her own land. The memorial might appropriately take the form of a window or other ornament in the Church of St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, executed by some artist of repute; or, if enough money were forthcoming, of a dispensary or hospital building in Serbia or England. The decision can only be made when we have some idea of the amount that is promised. We purpose to confer then with Dr. Dearmer, and, if necessary, to form a small committee." The suggestion will, we are sure, appeal to many who are grateful for the noble example which Mrs. Dearmer has set her countrywomen. Contributions may be sent to Mrs. Lucy Henderson, 2, Hogarth Hill, Hendon, N.W.

GREAT MEETING HOUSE—COVENTRY.

APPEAL.

WE respectfully submit to your generous consideration a scheme of improvement and renovation of the above Church, embracing:—Installation of heating apparatus, reconstruction of old pews, and panelling of wall with spare material (black oak), cleaning and redecorating. Mr. Ronald P. Jones has carefully prepared the necessary plans and designs.

To do all that is really needed would cost £1,000, but in present conditions we appeal for £650 to cover the above absolutely necessary items.

The Church was founded in 1662. Its influence has been important and far-reaching. Of late years, however, the congregation has been very small, sometimes less than ten persons being present. Thanks to the faithfulness of a few, and the help of the B. and F.U.A., and the Mid. Christian Union, an attempt is being made to revive the work. Since the end of March last, when the Rev. Leonard Short was appointed minister, the average attendance in the morning has gone up to over 30, and in the evening to over 80. There is also a marked improvement in the Sunday School. This progress, however, cannot be expected to continue, or even be maintained unless the above scheme is quickly carried out.

The scheme has the approval of the B. and F.U.A. and the President of the Mid. Christian Union, W. Byng Kenrick, Esq., writing to Rev. L. Short, says:—

"After a careful inspection of the Great Meeting House, Coventry, and an examination of the details of the proposed alterations, I am convinced that they are reasonable and necessary and should be completed as soon as possible. Having regard to the present resources of the congregation, I consider the contribution which they will make as adequate. I sincerely commend the appeal to all friends of our Churches in the Midlands, and I promise to give £25 to the Fund... It is hardly necessary to add that your work at Coventry has the cordial approval of the Committee of the Midland Christian Union, as they voted to the congregation a substantial grant in aid of the ministry, but they have no money at their disposal to devote to the erection or repair of buildings."

Donations will be gratefully received and acknowledged by C. C. Johnson, Secretary, Rosemeath, Earlsdon Avenue, Coventry.

Leonard Short, minister, 10, Chester Street, Coventry.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

OUR recent appeals for winter clothing and various other special requisites for the Belgian Hospitals have met with a prompt and generous response. This does not mean that we do not want more and still more. Mrs. Allen has just come back from her long tour of inspection in France. We know exactly what the needs are, and with a steady flow of gifts we shall be able to do an incalculable amount of good this winter. The best thing that many of our friends can do to help our efforts is to make the work known in ever wider circles. Our own experience is that interest is quickly aroused, and as soon as the plan of operations is explained interest turns into eagerness to do something.

BUT a campaign of persuasion of this kind requires definite information, which is at once recent and reliable. Here are some facts which may be used in this way. The consignment which is going out this week includes surgical instruments and other special requisites for fifteen hospitals or convalescent depots; also about 1,200 blankets and 1,000 pairs of stout leather slippers. The number of garments sent in in response to our special appeal for winter clothing is almost 3,000. These are also going out together with a large quantity of bandages, dressings, &c., and a number of Flemish story books. Besides all these we are sending a typewriter, a gramophone, two wheel chairs, and a Cramer pianette, as special gifts from subscribers, and a large number of games. At the present moment we are sending help to about 80 hospitals and convalescent depots, and with only two or three exceptions we have visited them all on our tours of inspection.

MANY readers will be interested to learn that on her recent visit to Calais Mrs. Allen was able to go about in our own motor. It is not a luxurious vehicle but a most convenient one. The body was built to our own specification, and has been constructed to carry either parcels or passengers. It runs about the town delivering our goods to the hospitals, and is also in constant use to convey weak and aged refugees from the station to the hospice, or to take little children home from the Belgian school when the evenings are dark and wet. The Belgian military authorities have been most helpful in the matter in giving us the necessary permits. They have also provided us with a military chauffeur, a keen and capable man—an engineer by profession—who has seen much service in the war and has been wounded four times. He will not be able to return to active service for some months, and so works for us.

DURING the past week the interest of the war seems almost to have found its centre at home instead of abroad. Things of importance have, of course, happened at the front, and chief among them has been the steady improvement in the Russian positions. When this has been pushed a little farther it will begin to have important political results. The Balkan campaign has also made some progress and successes have been claimed by both sides. The whole position is still tangled and confused and must remain so until the Allies have sufficient forces at their disposal to begin a vigorous campaign. Meanwhile it is well not to make too much of isolated victories. The important decisions still lie ahead, and there is no evidence known to the public that the Germans have enough troops to spare to meet a vigorous offensive. There has also been a revival of submarine activity in the Mediterranean. If we may judge from experience it is likely to be short-lived. The defeat of the German submarine has been one of the most important successes of the war. Its results have been as far-reaching as many victories on land.

AT home the chief events have been the reception of the American Note, the orgy of gloom and grumbling on the part of a few peers in the House of Lords, the suspension of The Globe newspaper, and the vigorous speeches by members of the Government at the Guildhall. The American Note is a long and serious document which seems to us to make more of technicalities than of principles. Possibly it is intended to satisfy commercial pressure on the part of a group of American traders without disturbing amicable political relationships. Here we only desire to emphasise two points. First, whatever loss or inconvenience America may suffer from the necessary pressure of our sea-power she ought to be careful to make it quite clear that her protests against German crimes are not in the same category as diplomatic discussions about the freedom of the seas.

Secondly, America and all other neutral countries have derived benefits of capital importance for themselves through the action of our fleet. So far from injuring the freedom of their trade it has secured it to them within the limits possible in a state of war. In other words we have confined the operations of maritime warfare to a very narrow area, and left all the other waterways of the world open to peaceful commerce.

It is hard to see what good purpose is supposed to be served by the captious and gloomy speeches which were delivered in the House of Lords on Monday. When we pierce through their sonorous phrasing they amount to little more than ineffective grumbling. Of Lord Courtney we would always speak with all possible respect. We can imagine John Bright speaking in the same vein, only the passion with which he brushed aside the possibility of our acquiescing in German domination in this country, and his insistence that Belgium and the North of France must be delivered, revealed his close agreement in essentials with the Government position. It was the speech of a noble-hearted man who is deeply moved by the misery of the war but has no alternative plan to suggest. The two other speeches came from men who may be described as disappointed politicians. They seldom speak of anything in public with admiration or hearty approval. They have accepted the lonely part of the fault-finder, and a vein of personal bitterness infects all their criticism of men who are abler and more successful public servants than themselves. Speeches like theirs have this use. They reveal the faults of temper and personal bias which have marred much of the criticism of recent months, and they encourage us to treat it with the scorn which it deserves.

THE suppression of The Globe newspaper for a flagrant offence against the military interests of the country has been accepted by public opinion with general approval. There have been some protests in quarters which cannot be suspected of any sympathy with the opinions of The Globe, on the ground that the action of the authorities was high-handed and strikes a blow at the sacred freedom of the press. This is, perhaps, the professional point of view of the newspaper world, but we do not think that it will bear serious examination. In normal times of peace newspapers work under restrictions which have been framed in the interests of public order and decency. The freedom of the Press was made for man, not man for the freedom of the Press. The case could not be put better than in the incisive words of the Prime Minister:—

At a somewhat critical moment in the conduct of the war we found a journal which saw fit to invent and to circulate a lie; not only a lie but a malignant lie; and not only a malignant lie but a mischievous lie, but after that lie had been contradicted on the highest authority it was deliberately reasserted. I venture to say to this company and to my fellow-countrymen outside that to talk of the freedom of the Press in such a connection is to be guilty of a ridiculous travesty of a noble watchword.

THE speeches at the Guildhall on Tuesday were chiefly remarkable for their note of confidence and vigour. It was not the place or the occasion for any elaborate defence of policy. An exception, however, must be made of the speech by Mr. Balfour, who spoke in the gravest possible way about the injury which has been done in other countries to the Allied cause by a type of newspaper criticism with which we are all familiar. "We British," he said, "have always taken a gloomy joy in self-depreciation. It is no new phenomenon," and he proceeded to point out that it is one which, though harmless among ourselves, may have very serious effects upon other people.

I have not the slightest objection personally [he said] to domestic criticism as long as it is domestic; but when you come to the state of things which we have now in which articles in great papers are translated by the Germans and circulated in hundreds of thousands in neutral countries, is it not a proof that we are misusing a freedom of the Press which may have its legitimate sphere within the four seas but is capable of being perverted to the most dangerous uses by a highly-organised and powerful Government like that of Germany, when it sets to work, not merely to conquer the world with its arms but to flood it with its lies? I have, perhaps, travelled far from the Army and the Navy, which is the subject of the toast; but I think that in reality if our public utterances raise up new forces in the East and in the West, or wherever it may be, there the Army and the Navy are concerned; there the pouring out of blood is increased, there the sacrifices of the country are extended in time and increased in amount. There, in short, you will have added strength to your enemies, and all your adversaries, whether they be on land or on sea, will be harder work to overcome.

We are glad that these words have been spoken. They do not come a moment too soon. To supply the German official press with the ammunition of pessimism and slander which it needs in order to turn other people against us is a far worse crime than trading with the enemy.

THERE could be no better sign of the seriousness with which the country is taking the war than the widespread unwillingness to make any exceptions of class or profession to the obligation of military service. The appeal is to the whole manhood of the nation. Even a few months ago the suggestion that ministers of religion should enlist was met with a good deal of angry protest. Now it is quietly accepted because it is practically impossible to find excuses for them which would not apply with equal force to others as well. A remarkable pronouncement has come this week from the Committee of Privileges of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, who held a meeting to consider the situation. On the general question of the enlistment of ministers the Committee, while recognising the importance to the national welfare of maintaining in efficiency the ministrations of the Christian Church in the present crisis, also recognised the right of His Majesty's Government to call upon ministers of religion for military service at a time like the present when the life and liberties of the nation are threatened. The Committee expressed profound respect for the conviction of those ministers of the Methodist Church who feel it their solemn duty to enlist in His Majesty's forces, and while putting no obstacle in the way of following their conviction, reminded them that in the present crisis the efficiency of the Church is one of the greatest assets of the nation, and that the maintenance of that efficiency may be the highest service that ministers can render to the State.

THERE is good reason to believe that further restrictions upon the sale of drink in the London area are imminent. It is stated that the hours of opening on week-days will be from noon to 2.30 P.M., and from 6.30 P.M. to 9.30 P.M. This reduction of hours coupled with the no-treating order should do much to remove what has been a public shame and a curse to our soldiers and munition-workers since the beginning of the war. The change in public opinion has been remarkable. No effective protest has been organised against this curtailment of liberty, and the Trade, much as it must dislike it, has the patriotism and good sense to keep quiet. We have long advocated that no drink should be sold to men in uniform. Nothing else will be really effective so far as the army is concerned. Social reformers should watch these experiments in regulation with a keen eye, for they are providing a large fund of experience which can be turned to good account when the war is over.

SOME one has pointed out the absurdity of our change of attitude towards men the moment they become soldiers. Forthwith we begin to make moral and spiritual demands upon them such as we did not dream of making so long as they remained civilians. What is more, they for the most part respond to those demands, respond, moreover, willingly and not merely as men under compulsion. Unflinching courage, limitless self-sacrifice, absolute loyalty, unquestioning obedience to lawful authority, cheerfulness alike in danger and in suspense—who expects all these from the ordinary civilian? Yet to the soldier they are almost matters of course, part of a great tradition into which he has entered.

The absurdity lies in this, that these great qualities could not possibly be developed in the soldier unless they were already latent in the civilian. Yet we overlook or ignore the fact that if we all have the roots of them in us it is as much our duty to cultivate them while we remain civilians as it is when we become soldiers.

In ordinary times a vulgar mind might say, "we expect these things from our soldiers because they are part of the bargain, things for which we pay," forgetting that they are qualities which cannot be measured in terms of money. To-day, when so many on joining the army are giving up in money so much more than they will receive, such an argument becomes simply ridiculous.

Or shall we say, "The man has undertaken to serve his country, it is in the bond, he would not be doing his duty if he failed in these high qualities." Who among us dare stand forward to-day and claim exemption from the duty of serving his country in some way? The one really unfortunate man is he who can find no way, and is conscious of a debt which he is unable to pay. Yet too many of us are still seeking a limited liability which we do not accord to the soldier.

How can we hope to be able to discharge this duty, which we dare not repudiate, unless we are prepared to practise the virtues which we expect to find in our soldiers? The sooner we all come to regard ourselves as "men in the ranks" the better it will be for our country and for ourselves. Nothing is more needed to-day than that we should all cultivate those great military virtues, considering ourselves as men under orders which we are not at liberty to dispute. Unfortunately there are still too many who prefer the part of spectators with unlimited liberty of criticism, and just so much liability as it is convenient to take on with due regard to personal safety when it is all over. It is not yet sufficiently recognised among civilians that this is no time for the coward cult of safety. There is cowardice in shrinking from loss of possessions as in shrinking from risk to life. The thought of personal safety must be merged in that of the safety of our country, and even that must be subordinated to the safety of the causes we are defending. The individual civilian may take thought for safety just so far only, and for the like purpose, as the soldier in action may take cover—so far, that is, as may be necessary to enable him to play the best part he can in the general advance or defence. If we cannot help at times yearning for safety let it be such safety as Rupert Brooke wrote of:—

Safe shall be my going,
Secretly armed against all death's endeavours.

Safe though all safety's lost, safe when men fall:

And if these poor limbs die, safest of all.

He wrote as a soldier, but the lesson is for us all.

Let us return to the thought of civilians as men in the ranks. In how many does there not linger the idea that they were born to be officers—if not commissioned then, at least, non-commissioned officers—not mere rankers. Such men if leadership with its honours does not come to them are apt to fall back on the role of critics and grumblers. It may be that in this estimate of themselves some few are not wholly wrong, and that they are lacking not so much in the capacity for command as in opportunity. Such men will do well to imitate the many young men of education and position who have been content to become plain "Tommies," content to wait for an opportunity of promotion if it should come, content also, if it does not come, to do their duty under the orders of others. But most of us would do well to realise the plain facts that we are not qualified by nature for leadership nor by instruction for useful criticism, and that any attempt to assert ourselves in either capacity is simply mischievous, hurtful to the cause we have at heart and helpful to the enemy. One thinks in this connection of the wealthy manufacturer who, being pressed to take a commission, refused, saying, "I can not lead men into hell but I will follow any one," and enlisted in the ranks. That man knew himself and knew his duty also—would that the same could be said of all who remain civilians. Let us thank God that it can be said of so many. But when one reads some of our newspapers and listens to some of the conversation which goes on he is tempted to wish that there were some civilian sergeant able to give and enforce the sharp command, "Attention, no talking in the ranks."

Of course, no such restraint is possible from without. We are a free people, and within wide limits must have our liberty of speech and pen. But just because we are so free a people we ought to be willing and able to put a stern restraint upon ourselves. Ought not the question to be ever with us, whether it is more glorious to die for liberty or more ignominious to push liberty into licence and perish because of that.

There is, indeed, no disgrace in being merely "rankers," but some credit to be won in cheerfully accepting the fact, and some real glory in earnestly practising as civilians the virtues we so confidently expect from our soldiers. They cannot win this war for us unless we give them an adequate backing. We cannot do that unless we do as we would have them do.

IGNOTUS.

OUR OPEN TRUSTS.

WE desire to call attention to the important letter by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson which appears in our present issue. We recognise how difficult it is to switch off our minds from grave national concerns to the more domestic issues of our religious life; but the question of encouraging churches with an open trust to accept the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as the trustee of their property is one of such far-reaching importance that we think it ought to be discussed quite frankly in our columns. We regret that the new policy, so far as the Association is concerned, has been settled apparently without adequate public discussion, for on the face of it it is an anomaly that an Association which has deliberately decided not to hold property of its own should act as trustee for the property of others. We are aware that trustees have no power to alter a trust. If a congregation with an open trust for whom the Association is acting as trustee were to change its views and its denominational allegiance there would be no ground for interference. The question is rather this, will this close connection with the Association as trustee tend to prejudice the theological development of the congregation in a certain direction and so act as a drag upon its freedom? It is hardly open to doubt that many of our churches would not have emerged into the position which they hold to-day if early in the eighteenth century they had placed their property in trust with an Association pledged to Calvinism.

We believe that the present managers of the Association are entirely loyal to the principle of freedom. But how will it be fifty years hence? Trustees who are definitely and finally pledged to Unitarianism may not unnaturally drift into a preference for Unitarian trusts. It is that danger which we have to guard against with jealous care, for the open trust is one of our most distinctive possessions. It is the guarantee of our liberties and a bulwark against dogmatism and intolerance. Are these dangers entirely fanciful? In adopting its new policy has the Association taken all the needful steps to guard against them? Or has practical convenience made it gently blind to the possible consequences of its own action? These are matters upon which we should like to ask, in the friendliest possible spirit, for some explanation.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

I HAVE a life with Christ to live,
But, ere I live it, must I wait Till learning can clear answer give
Of this or that book's date?
I have a life in Christ to live,
I have a death in Christ to die;—
And must I wait till science give
All doubts a full reply?

Nay, rather, while the sea of doubt
Is raging wildly round about,
Questioning of life and death and sin,
Let me but creep within Thy fold, O Christ, and at thy feet
Take but the lowest seat,
And hear thine awful voice repeat
In gentlest accents, heavenly sweet,
Come unto Me, and rest:
Believe Me, and be blest.

PRINCIPAL SHAIRP.

THE WAYS OF PROVIDENCE.

WHY is the doctrine of Providence, even when we admit it, so often without power? Because we are so little in the habit of recognising, of really meeting any kind of existence but our own, that the Spirit of God is too unfamiliar to sustain us thoroughly.

What damps all hope, confuses all faith, when we look to the wars and fightings among men, grow perplexed and dark about that great problem God is working out—the cleansing of a long unrighteousness, the progression of humanity, the peace and good will that are to make one family of all the families of earth? What is it when our guesses into the future are all nullified, our calculations not accepted by Him, our feet turned away from some path our hopes had opened, makes us feel for a time as if all existence was a wreck, because our schemes have turned out vain, our judgments wrong or premature?

Is not this to clothe Providence with our weakness, and to make God like ourselves? We are overwhelmed by the difficulties that embarrass the problem of "peace on earth," of man's perfectibility, and we despair as though God felt the difficulty as we do, and worked within the limits of our fleeting days. There is a difficulty, but it lies solely in the human will, and He to whom a thousand years are as one day and one day as a thousand years will wait, using meanwhile all the resources of instruction and persuasion, till that voluntarily rights itself, rather than violate the first law of spiritual existence, and create obedience by power. Ever, as of old, the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent would take it by force. We, in our impatience, think God is slow, and would have Him extinguish misused liberty, and by a command cause all disobedience to vanish from before His face. "Thou thoughtest I was altogether such a one as thyself."

J. H. THOM.

O GOD, who through the fellowship of Christ hast consecrated unto us a new and living way into thy holy presence, grant to us, we beseech thee, the assurance of thy mercy, and sanctify us by thy heavenly grace, that we, approaching thee with a pure heart and undefiled conscience, may offer unto thee the trustful sacrifice of sons of God
AMEN.

THE BELGIAN CONVALESCENT DEPOTS IN NORMANDY.

THIS last visit was undertaken in consequence of what we saw on our visit to Brittany in August. We then found that the convalescent depots of the Belgian Army were in need of considerable help to make them really comfortable, and we heard that there were ten more of these depots in Normandy. On October 18 the Editor of THE INQUIRER and myself left Victoria at 10 A.M. to join Mr. Kelland at Rouen. We reached Rouen at 2 A.M. next day! Travelling is designedly not made easy just now, and those of us who have to undertake it learn to take things as they come, and are thankful to be allowed to go at all.

Early next morning the usual tiresome official visits had to be paid, and though our modest request to be allowed to motor through Normandy to visit the depots of the region was received with amazement that any civilian should have the temerity to ask for such a privilege, yet in the end we received all the permits we required, as no one really wishes to obstruct people with a genuine mission such as ours.

The Anglo-Belge Hospital at Rouen was started by an English Committee, and is specially designed for mecano-therapy. Here are sent men from all Belgian hospitals who require this special treatment. We saw there every sort of device for restoring the power of movement to muscles after wounds and amputations. They have all kinds of electrical appliances, massage, hot air treatment, and mechanical apparatus where each muscle of the body can be gently and regularly exercised until it is restored to its normal condition; but the most interesting part of the whole scheme is that all this apparatus is made by the men themselves in workshops attached to the hospital, and not only these things but also artificial legs and arms of such marvellous perfection that when the patient is used to it he can quite easily deceive you into thinking he is possessed of the usual number of real limbs. Experience is proving the necessity of men beginning this treatment much earlier than was at first supposed, which has led to their being received at the hospital while still requiring a good deal of surgical treatment, and it was to help on this side of the work that our aid was invoked. We are accordingly sending out what they needed for this new development, and feel honoured to take a little part in a real bit of reconstructive work, as there they are turning men who a few years ago would have been regarded as useless for work into useful citizens, able to take a man's part in life, and be self-supporting.

That same afternoon we left for H— and arrived there in the dark and pouring rain, so that it was impossible to do more than see the doctor in charge that evening. However, we heard from him a good deal about the local circumstances, and told him about our own work. The next morning we were out on the plage soon after 7 to see a large body of young Belgian recruits who had just finished their training, start off for the Front. They were stalwart lads, well equipped in every way and eager to do their part. The commanding officer addressed them at some length, and in conclusion said, "We have trained you to be men, vigorous, healthy, knowing the use of arms and of military discipline. Now you go to show how you can fight for your King and your country," and the lads responded with a ringing cheer. The convalescent depot there consists of three villas, one in the town, and two on a hill overlooking the sea in a most glorious position—for the summer!—but cold and exposed for people not yet recovered from an illness in the winter. The men from the villa in the town have to walk about twenty minutes up the hill to their meals, and have no stove in their villa. The officer in charge had been severely injured at the Front; but, though suffering still, was doing everything possible for the men. There were a good many men in the central villa confined to their beds—cases of relapse or of wounds that would not heal—and for these invalids a good deal was lacking. We hope to send out in a few days sufficient to make them comfortable. We found the doctor also greatly handicapped in his work by the want of certain surgical things which we are also sending at once.

We went on to C— next, and visited a depot installed in a large building which had been a laundry belonging to a neighbouring convent. The sisters had been very good in giving much material in the way of bed linen and other things, but the French lady who was in charge as chief nurse told me of many crying needs which it was beyond the power of the nuns to provide, such as slippers and warm clothes, and blankets for the men, and as winter was coming on they were very anxious on this point.

The same afternoon we went on to A— where the depot is housed in the dépendance of a hotel on the sea-shore—the position and the building were excellent, but the most urgent needs there were for lamps and blankets. There was no means of lighting the bedrooms after dark, that is about 4 p.m. in the winter, and only very poor light in the refectory. We are sending here a number of small safety lamps and a few large ones as they had no means of obtaining any, and the prospect of long winter evenings in total darkness seemed insupportable. There were a few men here confined to bed, and they were kindly and efficiently looked after by a Belgian abbé, who was acting as nurse. He was very handicapped by lack of material for his work, but we left him much cheered by the prospect of help.

We had done all we could for that day, so we stayed the night at A—, and set off early next day to J— M—, and here we found the saddest assemblage of men we had yet seen. There were 160 patients whose nervous system had broken down owing to the strain of life in the trenches. They were housed in a Trappist monastery which had been vacated nineteen years before, but the building was in excellent condition, and had a good garden, and was quite well adapted for its present use. There were good beds and three sisters of charity to look after the most helpless cases, and the whole staff seemed most kind and gentle with these poor fellows, for they are exceedingly difficult to deal with as their mental condition is not normal, and ordinary standards of conduct cannot be expected. Still, the slightest harshness may have a retarding effect on their recovery, so, you see, it is a most delicate and exhausting task that these devoted doctors and sisters have to perform. There were several patients for whom any exertion was bad, and yet who would benefit greatly by a little change to the garden, and in response to the Editor's appeal we have already two wheel chairs for them. We are also sending out a gramophone and a pianette, as it happens the doctor is himself a pianist and a great believer in the power of music to soothe irritated nerves. Games and Flemish books are also real medicaments in these cases; a liberal supply of these would be very welcome. The chief doctor was an old friend whom we had known when he was in charge of a hospital at Dunkirk (which was evacuated when the town was bombarded), and he had been thinking of our Fund and had just resolved to write and ask us for help when he received the letter saying we were on our way to visit him.

The next hospital we visited was near E—, and was in a convent building. There were about 250 men here, many of them in bed, and there were two English nurses. They were very glad to see us as they had exhausted their resources, and showed me their empty clothes cupboards. These we promised to refill as their desire to give each man a clean shirt and pair of socks every week did not seem to us unreasonable, though it seemed quite impossible for them, as they were, to realise this ideal. A good deal of mecano-therapy is done here, and still more will be done when they have the means. We next visited V—, a depot for the mutilated and amputated situated on the banks of the Seine. When the first idea was broached of having a school for such cases, a beautiful estate of many acres in extent was at once placed at the disposal of the authorities by a patriotic Belgian gentleman. This estate is situated on high ground overlooking the Seine, and the soil and position are all that could be desired. The work of clearing the ground and erecting the huts only began last July, but already there are 600 men as permanent inmates, and there will be 2,000 when all is finished. There are workshops for teaching them carpentry, metal work, basket work, tailoring, printing, architecture, bookbinding, and electrical fitting. There are class-rooms where the illiterate are taught to read and write, and where commercial classes (such as book-keeping, typewriting, shorthand, &c.), are held. As each new hut is put up new trades can be undertaken, the idea being that with plenty of variety the exact piece of work which the man is able to perform best within his limits can be discovered. The officers have themselves done their part in the field, and can no longer undertake active service. They are men of wide knowledge and sympathies, and their whole hearts seem to be in the work of making life again a good and happy thing for the patients. When one remembers that few of these ever hear from their people, one can well imagine the depression to which they are all liable. To avoid this as much as possible a salle des récréations will shortly be provided; we saw the plans prepared in the Architecture Class for the hall in question, and the site on the edge of the hill. The men will provide their own orchestra, their own theatrical company, and there will also be a canteen. Each man receives a small sum for every working hour, and he is encouraged to put this in a savings bank. He has also his small pension of about fourteen francs a week as "disabled." It is expected that everybody will have a little capital at the end of the war with which to start himself in the trade he has learnt. There is a similar institution at another town where the same sort of work is done, only there they are already accepting contracts from the British Army, and are turning out the goods as fast as they can. This depot is specially interesting because the capital with which to start it was lent by an English lady married to a Belgian. After about three months' working the capital is already repaid, and sufficient money is in hand for further extensions and developments. A good deal of land is under cultivation and agriculture is taught scientifically, and the why and wherefore of every piece of work in the field explained by instructors in the class-rooms.

The policy of our Fund has always been to help the Belgians to help themselves. The instances I have described in this article will show what a splendid use they can make of any aid that is given them.

Next week I hope to describe the other depots we visited, not, alas! in such happy conditions; and also my short visit to Belgium.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have read with regret that at the recent meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association it was reported that, as a result of the incorporation of the Association, qualifying it to act as Trustee of chapels, its appointment as such was recommended to congregations, and that the report was adopted. I am more sorry than I can tell—at a time when union before a mighty foe is the watchword of the day, and on the morrow of the magnificent call to such a union uttered in addresses at the Conference—to speak a word of discord; but I should be false to every tradition into which I was born and whose blood, as it were, courses in my very veins, if I was silent. I was secretary, well back into the last century, to the "declarants" at whose head stood my religious fathers in the faith, James Martineau, John Hamilton Thom, and Charles Beard, in opposing the erection of a Hall with a Unitarian Trust, and we laboured not in vain. The same foundation principle "of the religion of the open door" triumphed in Essex Hall, and a special trust deed was drafted in lieu of vesting it in the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. I am not raising the question of the Unitarian name. It is not the name in its right place that I object to. It is in its right place in that Association; but it is constituted by individuals propagating their own Unitarian faith. But the Association bearing that name is entirely out of place as trustee of chapels with open trusts. I have a great regard for Mr. Bowie. In his private capacity he is an admirable trustee of our chapels. I don't want to bar the most enthusiastic of Unitarians from being their trustees. But it is a very different thing to call in our Unitarian propagandist Association to join in the administration of chapels that are no more Unitarian in their foundation to-day than say our beloved Hyde Chapel was Calvinist when the old Conventicle bearing the same honoured name was built two hundred years ago by Calvinists. It's very differentia lies in its having passed, under the egis of its liberty of thought, without let or hindrance, or change of name, out of Calvinism through Arminianism, Arianism, Old School Unitarianism, to the New Unitarianism or Free Catholicism of to-day. In each generation we are tenants of our sacred buildings and think our own ever-changing thoughts, handing on the tenancy to our children and our children's children with the same freedom to worship according to conscience that our fathers left to us. I hope congregations will think very carefully before inviting the Association to act as their trustee. I conclude as I began. I have seen as much as any man what strength there is in union amongst us, and I have reaped its fruits. I lament this apple of discord thrown amongst us. It is not my doing. I should be a coward if I did not enter my protest and I should lose my self-respect as a traitor to my old leaders and as their too feeble representative in a cause which is as dear to me as it was to them.—Yours, &c.,

COMPULSORY SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In your issue of October 16th you say: "If the Government tells us that conscription is necessary.... we shall have no inclination to take up an intransigent attitude. It has become a matter for careful calculation, and violent rhetoric should be avoided on one side and the other." Will you kindly allow me to express the other view? That it is not a matter of calculation, but it is a matter of principle. That it is a question of liberty versus slavery. That to compel a man to join the Army against his will, is a crime. That it is the same species of crime as that against which the whole nation is now fighting. That the same class of argument which is used to justify conscription, has been used to justify every other form of slavery.

The same kind of argument was used formerly in this country, and is to-day used in some parts of Europe by members of established churches, to enforce their religion upon those who are inclined to differ from them. Only it seems to me that the argument of the churchman is far stronger, and far more justifiable than the arguments in favour of conscription or military slavery. The conscriptionist merely demands compulsory military service because he thinks he can get the number of men required for the Army at a less cost than if he has to offer them the wages which would be necessary to attract them to the service. And he has another motive, which is, that when compulsory military service is fully established, the Government of the day can make war without having to consider whether or not the war is likely to be supported by popular sentiment to such an extent as to secure the voluntary enlistment of a sufficiently large army. But the case for the churchman is not a question of financial economy. It is to defeat the machinations of schismatics who would mislead the people, and cause them to turn from the true religion to the false, and so bring about their eternal damnation. It is, in fact, a question of whether or not Christ shall triumph over the devil. If ever compulsion was justifiable, surely it is in such a case. It is straining the case for liberty to demand that these schismatics should have the right to carry on their campaign against Christ. Nevertheless, the advocates of liberty in this country have triumphed. The orthodox churchman is compelled to sustain his cause by argument and by pecuniary sacrifice. I think it must be admitted that none of the issues of this war are for a moment comparable in importance with the issues of the religious war in which our ancestors gained their freedom. No victory that the Germans could gain by their armies could be for us so shameful or degrading as a voluntary surrender to the principle of military slavery.—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

Victoria Street, S.W.,

November 10, 1915.

[We do not agree with our correspondent that the issues of the present war are less important than those involved in the religious struggles of the past. So far as it is possible to estimate their far-reaching influence they are far more so. It is just the failure on the part of a small minority of Englishmen to grasp this fact that makes them slow in imagination and slack in effort. May we also remind our correspondent and those who are inclined to agree with him that our French Allies are neither slavish nor wicked because they have a system of compulsory service, nor are they less ardent in the cause of freedom than ourselves.—Editor of THE INQUIRER.]

NARROWING OUR IDEALS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Most of the readers of THE INQUIRER will, like myself, welcome the outspoken and eloquent protests by Dr. Hargrove and Mr. Charlesworth against any narrowing of the great religious ideals for which our group of Free Churches have so long stood. And for what reasons are such narrowings advocated, and such apparent abandoning as unworkable of "Theism" which was described rightly by Dr. Hargrove as the religion of Jesus? The answer given is a possible larger attendance at church, selling our birthright for a mess of pottage. I think that people who argue thus must on reflection admit that religion is to be judged by something much deeper and more vital than the facts of the average attendance at the services of the church. If the members of our Free Churches show themselves as good, and certainly more public-spirited citizens than the average of other churches, the credit must surely be put to the free spirit engendered by our system of unfettered thought and freedom from the trammels of imposed liturgies, creeds, &c., such as obtain in and so seriously hamper the sincerity and spirituality of the National Church.

It is somewhat strange that Mr. H. H. Johnson, who asks "if we think that our petty little individual efforts are going to save the world?" and goes on to say that "it was only in proportion as they were part of the great universal Christian Church that they were going to help towards that end," does not see that our little group of churches is really much more than any others identified with religion all over the world, with the real Church Universal, and not, simply with a church, however numerous, whose name—but not whose spirit we will hope—puts its members outside all the great non-Christian religions of the world.—Yours, &c., R. R. MEADE-KING.

MR. KENNETH GRAHAME, author of 'The Golden Age,' has compiled for the Cambridge University Press an anthology in two parts entitled, 'The Cambridge Book of Poetry for Children.' Avoiding, on the one hand, poems in blank verse, in dialect, and in archaic language and, on the other, the whole corpus of verse written about children, which, "when the time comes that we send our parents to school, will prove very useful to the compilers of their primers," Mr. Grahame has made his collection chiefly one of lyrical verse, because "as an introduction to English poetry there is no better portal" than this. The books are primarily intended for use in schools, but will also be published in better bindings for presentation purposes.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is one of M. Vandervelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depots for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

DR. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER IN THE UNITED STATES.

ADDRESS ON INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

DR. CARPENTER, who is at present lecturing in America, has been warmly welcomed by his numerous friends on the other side of the Atlantic. The Christian Register reports that at the opening of the autumn session of the Ministerial Union at Channing Hall, Boston, when he was received by the President, the Rev. C. W. Wendte, there was a large attendance of Unitarian ministers, and a number from other denominations. Dr. Carpenter spoke for an hour on the development of theology in Great Britain during the past thirty years. At the close of his address the Rev. Dr. George A. Gordon spoke in felicitous terms, and Prof. George Foot Moore and Dr. George C. Cressey added a few words. In the afternoon Dr. Carpenter was the guest of honour at a luncheon held at the Twentieth Century Club rooms, under the auspices of the Ministerial Union. Again there was a large attendance. The Rev. C. W. Wendte presided, and introduced successively as the speakers of the occasion Profs. George Foot Moore and Kirsopp Lake of the Harvard Divinity School, and the Revs. Edward Cummings, Albert Lazenby, and Samuel M. Crothers. The tributes paid to Dr. Carpenter as a scholar, broad-churchman, teacher, and friend were impressive and graceful, and met with the heartiest response from all present. Dr. Carpenter's reply at the close was a model of good taste and appreciativeness. The occasion was felt to be one of peculiar appropriateness and interest.

Dr. Carpenter was also present at the first meeting of the season in connection with the Boston Unitarian Club on Oct. 13, at the Hotel Somerset, when President William S. Kyle, of Plymouth, occupied the chair, and "Unitarians and the New Internationalism" was the subject of the addresses. The first speaker was the Rev. Clay MacCauley, who has been identified so long with the Unitarian Mission in Japan, and he was followed by Dr. Carpenter, who had already been cordially welcomed at the dinner which preceded the meeting. Dr. Carpenter at the outset delivered the greetings of the Unitarian Association of England "to that community across the sea which has produced saints in our fellowship whose names will always be held in honoured remembrance." "But I speak to-night," he continued, "as much more than a Unitarian. I speak as an Englishman, and I would that I could find words to express to you the deep debt that my nation feels in the abounding sympathy of your country in the tremendous crisis in which we have been plunged."

Proceeding, Dr. Carpenter asked, "What is the real basis of true international relations? There are but two workable schemes: the one, the relation of force, the power of superior might; the other, the relation of law, of respect for the great ethical principles, and an attempt to realise lofty ethical ideals. The first conspicuous illustration of the second method is to be found in the agreement of a hundred years ago by which the great frontier between Canada and the United States has been left unguarded by ships of war or fortifications and to be defended by the good-will of the nations which were thus divided."

"The ideal of a world state has been the object of religion from very ancient times. It was hinted at by Isaiah and by Jesus. In the Middle Ages we find actual attempts in this direction when the Catholic Church and the Holy Roman Empire attempted together to realise universal sovereignty and universal peace. But the emperor was a German—Henry IV. The German historians have recently revived this ideal and they have presented it afresh as the ideal to which Germany should aspire, and this has had a powerful influence in bringing about the disastrous ambitions which have culminated in this frightful contest."

"The ideal of internationalism, for which my country endeavours to stand, was first prophetically indicated by Tennyson when he spoke of the 'Parliament of man, the Federation of the world.' The first actual attempt to translate that into any form of organisation was the rescript of the Czar which called the first Hague Congress. We have seen in the course of history experiments in that direction. Switzerland is made up of three or four races welded together by mutual interests. In my own country we have a group of nations united under one crown. In your country, with what success you are meeting as you receive immigrants from almost every land and bring them into your civilisation!

"On the other hand, the German Empire holds up to us a very different ideal. It has been created as a result of successful wars. Von Buelow declares: 'It is a law of life and development of national history that where two different civilisations meet they fight for ascendancy. In the struggle between nationalities one is the hammer and the other the anvil.' England has sought to draw together the nations that compose its empire into a commonwealth of nations. We do not practise the hammer-and-anvil theory, and if there has been one instance of that kind in recent times, yet that policy has been so far atoned for by the free gift of political liberty that none of our dependencies has shown a stronger sympathy with our cause than the Dominion of South Africa.

"The problem which will confront us ultimately in the settlement which at some time (God grant that it may be soon!) must issue from this horrible conflict will be a conflict of ideals—the conflict between the conception of a great world power dominating Europe, and possibly attempting also to dominate the New World, and the conception of a commonwealth of peoples formed out of the various European states, and agreeing so to regulate their relations that should any of these break out unrestrained without submitting to arbitration any dispute, the rest shall combine to compel it to keep the peace. I do not see how we can continue to exist as a group of nations in Europe unless we can realise some such aim as that. But that aim can only be realised through a change of heart, a change of mind, a change of aim among the nations. That is the work of religion. That is where the great principles of Christian brotherhood will come in. That is where democracy will finally justify itself. And the word of one of our great bishops, Dr. Westcott, who declared that the motto of the French Revolution, 'Liberty, Equality, Fraternity,' was simply the translation of Christianity into modern terms—that great word shall be fulfilled, and peace shall at last be established on the face of the earth."

UNITARIAN HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

A MEETING of this Society was held on Thursday, Oct. 28. It was announced that Mr. John C. Warren, of Nottingham, had been elected by the Council as President of the Society. In his unavoidable absence the chair was taken by the Rev. James Harwood. An interesting paper was read by Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery, K.C., on "The Legal Records of an Ancient Chapel for Two Hundred Years." The chapel in question was that of Horsham, and Mr. Montgomery went step by step through the deeds of the trust from 1719 down to modern times and also made reference to the deeds of the Nicholas Haylor bequest. The documents reveal a remarkable sequence of family names familiar in our household of faith—Caffyn, Agate, Dendy, Tasker, Evershed, Sadler, Price, and others. There has been a continuity of feeling and spirit in the congregation, if not a doctrinal identity. As an addendum to his paper Mr. Montgomery gave a survey of the deeds of the Ditchling Meeting House from the earliest deeds converting the property from copyhold of the manor to "fee simple" with the assent of the then Lord of the Manor down to modern times. Here again many familiar names occurred, such as Browne, Chatfield, and Marten. The Ditchling or Ditchel-ling deed is remarkable as an example of a thoroughly "open trust."

A discussion followed in which Miss E. Kensett, Mr. Hope Pinker, Rev. Dendy Agate and Dr. Blake Odgers took part, and Mr. Montgomery was cordially thanked for his paper.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—A special memorial service was held at All Souls' Church on Nov. 2 for soldiers and sailors fallen in the war, and for Nurse Cavell, conducted by the Minister, the Rev. E. H. Pickering. In the course of his address Mr. Pickering said that neither Nurse Cavell nor the other heroes of the war had died in vain. We were fighting for a lasting peace, and the finest tribute we could pay to those who had gone was to pledge ourselves so to complete the gallant work they had begun that never again would man be called upon to fight against man, or mothers and wives be called upon to weep such bitter tears as were being shed to-day. A collection was taken on behalf of the Serbian Relief Fund, and the service closed with the 'Dead March in Saul,' 'The Last Post,' rendered by two buglers of the 5th Royal Irish Rifles, and Chopin's 'Marche Funèbre.'

Birkenhead.—The annual congregational soirée was held on October 20. The gathering was presided over by Mr. A. W. Willmer, and during the evening a special report was presented by the Secretary of the Ladies' Sewing Society, which showed how the members are busily employed in the making of comforts for the soldiers. The following is a brief summary of the report:—"From September 1, 1914, to October 19, 1915, the Society has sent away about 570 garments to various depôts including the Birkenhead Red Cross Society, three consignments to Holland for Belgian refugees, two to Mrs. Allen for the Belgian Hospitals in the North of France which are supported by Unitarian efforts, local battalions, the Scottish Women's Hospital in France and Serbia, the Birkenhead Maternity Hospital, and to a French Hospital. The head of this French Hospital told Miss Kilner, who was nursing there, and to whom the garments were sent, that ours were the best shirts and socks they had ever received, and the soldiers were most enthusiastic. Passing them from one to another down the ward to be examined and felt, they exclaimed as they ran their fingers over them: 'Flannel Anglaise!' Miss Ogden also received a touching letter of thanks from one of the French wounded soldiers. Another recognition of our work came to me from Private Davies of the Cheshire Regiment, who is a prisoner of war in Germany, thanking us for the parcel received, which shows how far-reaching our work is, and that the members of our small Society are 'doing their bit' in this time of storm and trouble."

Leeds.—The services last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond. At the evening service Mr. Drummond spoke on his recent visit to France, and a special collection was taken for the Belgian Hospital Fund.

Lincoln.—On Sunday afternoon, after being closed since 1902 the Lincoln church was reopened under the ministry of the Rev. Herbert W. King (late of Rotherham). In 1910-11 some services and lectures were held but no congregation formed. The church has a long history. The original cause came into being in the reign of Charles II. and the present building was erected in 1726. The last minister was the late Rev. Francis Revitt, whose memory is revered by many. Recently the interior has been completely altered and fitted with handsome oak furniture. Everything has been done to add to the beauty and dignity of this ancient church, and it is well worthy to represent Unitarianism in a city of fine churches. The services are being held for the present in the afternoon from 3.30 to 4.30, owing to the city being without any street lights at night.

The first service proved most successful. The church was filled by a congregation which contains excellent material for the upbuilding of an earnest and spiritual membership. Many expressed pleasure that the church was reopened and with the alterations made, and fifteen cards were signed by those who desire to associate themselves with the church. Many of the cards do not represent individuals only but families. In view of the difficulties anticipated this is felt to be a most encouraging response.

Liscard.—The Memorial Church Sunday School has lost the services of a devoted teacher and secretary in the removal of Mr. Edgar Hill, B.A., to Oxford, where he has gone into residence as a theological student. Before he left, a number of books were presented to him as a token of the appreciation and affection of the scholars and teachers.

London: Finchley.—It is announced that on Sunday, November 21st, the anniversary services, morning and evening, will be conducted by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne of Nottingham.

London, Hampstead.—A most successful meeting was held in the Hall attached to Rosslyn Hill Chapel last Monday evening to hear addresses on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund from Mrs. Bernard Allen, Mr. W. W. Kelland and the Rev. W. H. Drummond. The chair was taken by the Rev. H. Gow.

London: Stepney Green.—A memorial service was held on Sunday evening, Oct. 17, for the late Corporal William Wood and Bombardier Dean, who have been killed in action. The former, who was in his 21st year, had worshipped at the chapel since he was a boy, passing up through the Sunday School in which he subsequently became a teacher. His bright, genial spirit won him the love of all who knew him, and he seemed to have a promising career before him. Heartfelt sympathy is extended to the relatives of these brave soldiers. The Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held on October 24, conducted by Mr. Walter M. Long, Lay-worker in charge.

London: The Late Mr. Bernard Lewis.—The death of Mr. Bernard Lewis has removed one who for many years was keenly interested in Unitarian propaganda. His family connections were extensive, including the names of Wicksteed, Hincks, Clennell, and others well known. Originally belonging to the Hackney congregation, he became subsequently a member of those at Brixton, Wandsworth, Acton, and Richmond. He was one of the original trustees of the Wandsworth church, and there, as well as at Acton, was a zealous and most constant supporter. He was a member of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Society, and throughout his life of eighty-one years was untiring in the effort to extend liberal opinions, alike in religion and politics. His death at Mortlake on Tuesday, Nov. 2, was followed by a cremation service on the 5th, conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who in a brief address specially referred to his old friend's fearless pursuit of truth and warm-hearted temperament. Mr. Lewis, who was twice married, leaves a large family; he died at the residence of his cousin, Mr. Lindsay Clennell.

Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund.—The half-yearly meeting of the Board of Managers was held in London on Tuesday, 26th ult., Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery, K.C., presiding. The triennial report, afterwards presented to the National Conference, was approved. It was reported that war risks of ministers insured was accepted without extra premium in the case of policies taken out before the war. One new beneficiary was elected, and another application postponed. The report was presented of the sub-committee appointed to consider the application of the much enlarged income of the Fund due to the generous benefaction made by the late Mr. Philip Holt to the special fund which was instituted by him some years ago. Various recommendations of improved terms for beneficiaries were approved, subject to the sanction of a general meeting of the Fund, which will be held on December 1 after a further meeting of the Board, at which other proposals will be considered. New tables for insurance, submitted at the wish of the Board by the Equitable Society, were approved in substitution for those now in force, but to apply only to future policies.

Mansfield.—The Rev. C. M. Wright has offered himself to the Recruiting Officer for medical examination preliminary to enlistment, but failed to satisfy the medical requirements. The following comment on the Archbishop's instruction to the clergy not to enlist appears in the Old Meeting Calendar:—"No doubt there are numbers of young priests in the Church of England who will feel restless under the Archbishop's ruling. Whether he be right or wrong it is fair to point out that there is some inconsistency in such a command. When the "National" Church is entrusted with the duty of "blessing" the colours, "consecrating" battleships, and so on, why should it refuse to allow some of its sons to face the real perils, horrors and iniquities of war? It is sometimes said that ministers ought not to enlist because "what would become of the churches?" And no doubt, to people who believe in the value of Churches, that is a weighty argument. But surely if churches were to perish because the official preachers went away, it would be an indication that there was not much genuine belief in the value of churches among their members. A church primarily exists for worship, not to hear a man preach. Then again is not the present crisis forcing upon us once more the old problem of the divisions among churches? Think of the situation in this district or in any district. Twenty men, or thereabouts, laboriously prepare two sermons, which they deliver on Sundays to separate, and sometimes meagre, audiences. Could not some of these be spared? Why should not the Clergy and Ministers of the district get together, and say, 'Now some of us ought to offer ourselves in this fight for righteousness. We must arrange who shall go. Those who stay behind will endeavour to look after the various congregations. And we will see that the wives and children do not suffer. Of course we know that such a scheme would not have the remotest chance of being accepted. Therefore it is fair for any hostile critic to say that the churches are not in touch with realities. It is supremely difficult for a man in any walk of life to know what is the right thing to do. And amid the tumultuous passions of the hour we have to try to remember that the accusation of "shirking" is often much overdone, and that it is harder for some men to stay than to go. But the conscientious man finds it almost unbearable to preach the virtue of 'self-sacrifice' from the comfortable security of a pulpit, when he knows that better men than he are dying in thousands."

Sheffield.—The report for the year ending September 30 of the Unitarian War Distress Effort shows that 729 pairs of socks, 389 flannel garments, 139 respirators, 757 sandbags, 156 calico night shirts, and 366 pairs of mittens have been supplied, besides 209 garments contributed by the Upper Chapel Children's Clothing Guild, making a total of 3,257. A number of these were donations, but £104 8s. 3d. was expended upon the others, the receipts being £119 8s. 9d. Since then 88 more garments have been sent. There is urgent need, not only to maintain the same rate, but to exceed it, and additional contributions are earnestly appealed for.

Wandsworth.—Four Sunday evening sermons on "Books of To-day" are now in progress. On the 7th inst. the Rev. W. G. Tarrant (at the usual monthly "National Service") spoke on the subject of "J'Accuse, by a German." He emphasised the author's acquittal of England and her Allies from the charge of bringing on the War, and his repeated indictment of Germany and Austria as guilty of this atrocious crime. Other points included the persistent refusal of Germany for years past to join the majority of nations at the Hague Conferences in measures tending to lessen the danger of an outbreak, and the mischievous influence of the "War Party," including the Crown Prince, in perverting public opinion in his country. The author's plea for a "League of Free States" in Europe was also brought forward.—On the 14th inst. Mr. Tarrant is to speak on Alfred Loisy's "War and Religion."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A FAMOUS INDIAN LEADER.

The death of Sir Phirozeshad Mehta, K.C.I.E., the veteran leader of the Moderate Congress party in Western India, removes one of those enlightened patriots who have done so much to train their fellow-countrymen in the principles of ordered progress, and to strengthen their loyalty to the British Empire. He was the first Parsi M.A. of Bombay University, and, coming to London at the instigation of the Principal, Sir Alexander Grant, read at Lincoln's Inn and was the first member of his race to be called to the Bar. Sir Phirozeshad Mehta was the representative of the Bombay Corporation on the local Legislature for many years, he also served on the Supreme Legislation for three triennial terms, when he gave way to his younger coadjutor, the late Mr. Gokhale. He was one of the founders of the Indian National Congress, and presided at the Calcutta session of 1890. Sir W. Wedderburn places him among the Thinkers who rank highest in the four divisions of Manu which are still in active force (Thinkers, Fighters, Traders, and the Peasantry), who do the political thinking for the other classes that make up the millions of India, and whose influence has been strong enough to outweigh considerations of race and creed in the interests of freedom and righteousness.

THE MEMORIAL TO CAPT. SCOTT.

In unveiling the statue of the late Capt. Scott, the work of Lady Scott, in Waterloo Place last week, Mr. Balfour happily recalled the familiar quotation which tells us that peace has her victories no less renowned than war. "We are here to commemorate," he said, "the hero of one of those peaceful victories which, nevertheless, resemble the victories of war more than most victories of peace, in that it involved danger, struggle, and an heroic death. What the fleet has done for the safety of these shores, for the greatness of this Empire, and for freedom throughout the world, is a commonplace among the English-speaking peoples. We sometimes are apt to forget how much it has done in the unwarlike and yet most dangerous work of exploration, travel, and of wresting from nature secrets most jealously held... Capt. Scott showed all the great qualities of the British sailor, the British explorer, the British man of science."

THE PEASANT ARTS FELLOWSHIP LECTURES.

The committee of the Peasant Arts Fellowship recently decided to postpone the evening lectures which had been announced owing to the difficulty of getting about in the dark streets at night. They have now made arrangements to hold the meetings in the afternoon, and at the first one, on Wednesday, November 17th, Mr. Godfrey Blount will lecture on 'The Meaning and Making of Toys.' On Wednesday, December 15th, the Rev. H. J. Fynes-Clinton will speak on 'Russian Peasantry and Their Religion.' The meetings will be held at 3 o'clock in the Conference Hall, University of London Club, 19, Gower Street, W.C.

A SIGN OF GOOD WILL.

Every indication of the working of a sound mind and the spirit of reason among our enemies is welcome. The Hungarian Minister of Public Instruction, we are glad to hear, has issued a circular to all the teachers of the country, calling on them "to pay special attention to educating the children in the coming term to the respect and honour due to our enemies; that no hatred or contempt should enter the minds of the children against the brave men with whom their fathers are in deadly combat; and that hate or contempt is not to be cultivated in the youthful minds. On the contrary, they are to see in their enemies brave and honourable enemies, as do their fathers who fight." It is further explained that "the duty of masters and tutors should be to destroy for ever and dispel the thought from the young minds of the new generation—it being unworthy of a nation and inhuman to impress them with such ideas—that enemies are not men, that they can hardly be considered as human beings, or that they are bloodthirsty beasts who have to be annihilated and exterminated to the last." The tone of this circular is said to have made a great impression everywhere.

UNITARIAN CHURCH, STANLEY STREET, COLNE.

AN APPEAL.

Five years ago this Church became self-supporting, but urgent renovation of buildings and premises necessitated an outlay of £520 in 1913, and thus placed a heavy burden upon a working-class congregation. Yet, in addition to meeting ordinary Church expenses and raising upwards of £50 for the Special Fund, the Members are taxing their resources to the utmost for a

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

As we announced last week, an unusually large consignment has just been sent by our Belgian Hospital Fund to France. It will do much to make many of the hospitals and convalescent depots comfortable for the winter. Our supplies, fortunately, continue to flow in, but we use them all as fast as they come into our hands, and our bank balance has again sunk to small dimensions. This, we know, is what our supporters desire. We never keep more than a narrow margin as a matter of ordinary prudence, and in order to meet the charges to which we are definitely committed month by month.

It is very gratifying to notice that so far from interest in the work beginning to flag the churches seem to have thrown themselves into it during the last few weeks more eagerly than before. Several meetings have been held with excellent results, and our suggestion of a special collection for the Fund has been followed in many cases. In this matter the Church of the Messiah in Birmingham has set a good example. Its collection last Sunday amounted to more than £67. We venture not only to express our own gratitude but also to congratulate the

* * *

MAY we venture to repeat what we said a few weeks ago. It is our most earnest desire to bring the Fund up to £10,000 by the end of the year. We hope that some generous friends are storing up Christmas gifts for us towards the £1,400 which is still needed. If the value of our help in the first year of our work reaches £20,000—for it must be remembered that gifts in kind are of about the same value as the donations in money—we shall, at least, have done something of which we need not be ashamed, though it is small, indeed, compared with the suffering and misery which we are trying to relieve.

INTEREST this week has been concentrated almost entirely upon the Balkans. Very little reliable information has come through, and we have been dependent for most of our war news upon the impressions of journalists who glean what information they can at centres far distant from the scene of operations. We have no means at our disposal for estimating the value of their sources or for disentangling solid fact from alarmist rumour. In these circumstances the home virtues chiefly needed are steadiness and self-control. Everything we say and the mood which we encourage in ourselves and our neighbours must be such as to help the situation and not to hinder it:

It is clear that the equivocal attitude of Greece has for the time being played into the hands of Germany by hampering our movements. Probably this was the intention of King Constantine and he may indulge the hope that he is clever enough to go on playing this double game to his own advantage without drawing the Allies into any act of hostility. He has made a great mistake. The mission of Lord Kitchener is a guarantee that the situation will be handled in a strong and, should the need arise, in a peremptory way. If the King is still counting upon the traditional friendship of England and France for Greece to make us unwilling to take extreme measures, he is simply the victim of the usual moral dullness of men of German training. The abandonment of Serbia has dealt a terrible blow to our sentiment for Greece. The only service we can render her now is the argument of force before she slides further down the slippery path of national ruin.

THE resignation of Mr. Winston Churchill is a personal affair and has no political significance. He himself attributes it entirely to his non-inclusion in the War Council. No doubt to a man of his temperament it is a keen disappointment, and it is easy to appreciate and honour the feeling that it is impossible for him to acquiesce in the tenure of a position in the Cabinet of slight importance, which affords him no scope for his special gifts. Public opinion has taken the resignation very quietly. The concentration of responsibility in a few hands means that many personal ambitions must go unsatisfied, and it is plain to most people that Mr. Churchill is a difficult colleague. His retirement from the Admiralty when the Coalition Government was formed naturally involved his exclusion from the small inner circle.

THERE it would be wise to let the matter rest, at least for the present. Mr. Churchill would have consulted his own dignity better if he had left his letter to the Prime Minister as his only public justification for his action. His speech in the House of Commons was a brilliant performance, and to some extent it satisfied the appetite for information. We doubt, however, whether it was of any real public service, and it was marred by its assertive note of self-justification and its antagonism to Lord Fisher. No doubt Mr. Churchill has received a great deal of provocation. He has suffered, as others have done, from the mischievous inclination of some of our newspapers to look for scapegoats. But few sensible people really believed that he took important steps without consultation or rushed the members of the Cabinet into crude and dangerous enterprises against their will. Mr. Asquith is not the man to tolerate a colleague of that kind.

It was impossible for Lord Fisher to pass over some of the passages in Mr. Churchill's speech in complete silence. On Tuesday he made his reply in the House of Lords. It was very short. What he said deserves to be put on record as an example of the self-effacement of which great men are capable in critical times.

I ask leave of your lordships [he said] to make a personal statement. Certain references were made to me in a speech delivered yesterday by Mr. Churchill. I have been sixty-one years in the service of my country, and I leave my record in the hands of my countrymen. The Prime Minister said yesterday that Mr. Churchill had said one or two things which he had better not have said, and that he had necessarily left unsaid some things which will have to be said. I am content to wait. It is unfitting to make personal explanations affecting national interests when my country is in the midst of a great war.

THERE has been a good deal of controversy both in Parliament and in the Press about the obligation of single men to join the army before those who are married. It seems to be the intention of the Government to ask for powers to compel single men to enlist, if any considerable percentage of them hold back, before they take more married volunteers. There is, however, at the present moment no evidence that compulsion of this kind will be necessary, and on every ground alike of patriotism and of public expediency we hope that it will not be so. We must, however, state our own feeling quite plainly, that many men are allowing considerations of personal convenience to influence them too strongly. They are inclined to say, "The sacrifice that is asked of me is unreasonable; it is not my turn yet, some one else ought to go before me." Now that is not the right spirit. Tens of thousands of men who have joined the army already have made as great sacrifices as any that are demanded from fresh recruits. We have simply to face the plain fact that we cannot keep any of the blessings of peace without accepting all the risks of war. This is what the manhood of France is doing and we must not expect to fight our battles on any easier terms.

It is no doubt one of the arguments for compulsion that these difficulties could not then arise. Our voluntary system was devised in order to raise a small standing army out of a very large population. At a crisis like the present, when the whole manhood of the nation is indispensable for national safety, it is impossible to leave military service entirely in the old position of free and unfettered choice. It is, moreover, difficult to graft any principle of public selection upon the voluntary system, though that is exactly what Lord Derby is doing with a large measure of success. The only thing is for every available man to volunteer. It is not for the individual to decide whether he can be spared from civil life. If it is found that any profession or calling has been too severely depleted and the national life is suffering in consequence, a certain number can be drafted back, as France has done in the case of her teachers who were mobilised at the beginning of the war and have now been returned in large numbers to the schools.

IN its Ecclesiastical Notes last Wednesday The Westminster Gazette in the course of some remarks on the clergy and the army paid a tribute to the Unitarian minister which we welcome with sincere pleasure. "As far as can be gathered at present," it says, "Unitarian ministers—at least in many cases—refuse to shelter themselves behind their religious office, and prefer to consider themselves as citizens, like those who are now responding to their country's call." That is a position which we have tried to make clear in our own columns, and we believe that it is one for which there is a large measure of public approval. We have received a good deal of confirmation of the plea which we have constantly maintained, that young men are quick to ask why ministers of their own age and theological students should expect others to go while they themselves hold back, especially as many of them are not slow to express admiration of the heroism and self-sacrifice of our soldiers in the field.

LORD ROSEBERY seems almost to have dropped out of public life. From being one of the foremost men of his time he has become an occasional commentator upon national affairs. When, at long intervals, he breaks through his rule of silence he leaves us abundant food for thought. This was certainly the case when he spoke on the international situation at University College this week. Referring to the disappearance of the old Europe as we have known it, and the unfamiliar form which it would assume after the war he spoke in terms not of easy optimism but of grave warning.

There is [he said], one obvious reason for this, which is that in future it will be quite impossible to take note of treaty arrangements between great Powers without obtaining some material guarantee for their observance. Of course it is a truism to say that the signature of Germany, or, as I would rather say, of Prussia, to any instrument of any kind will have lost its value for any measurable distance of time which we can contemplate. But what is also true is this—that this general distrust must go beyond Prussia, because after what we have seen happen during the last fifteen months no nation will feel itself safe which bases its apprehension of peace on anything but some material guarantee of its own—that is, in the long vista, force.

LORD ROSEBERY illustrated his statement with a reference to the new naval policy of the United States, which has received less attention in this country than it deserves.

I do not know anything more discouraging [he said] than the announcement that has recently been made that the one great State in the world which is so remote and so powerful that one might think it might free itself from the hideous and bloody burden of war, is about to embark upon a huge Armada destined to be equal to our own, or second only to our own, which means that the burden will continue on all other nations, and to increase exactly in proportion to the fleet of the United States. I confess that this is a disheartening prospect—that the United States, so great and ancient a country, so remote from European conflict, should voluntarily in these days take up the burden which after the war will be found almost to have broken our backs.

WE have dwelt more than once recently upon the unspeakable horrors of the Armenian massacres. Mr. Arnold J. Toynbee has compiled a descriptive pamphlet dealing with the subject which may be had for one penny from Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. We commend it strongly to the attention of our readers. Like Lord Bryce's report on atrocities in Belgium it is a chapter in the history of hell let loose, which reveals in all its naked brutality the spirit which we are fighting to crush in this war.

ARE WE AWAKE?

It seems a curious question to ask after more than a year of one of the most savage and terrible wars in history? And yet it is forced upon us by the calmness, the strange detachment of mind, the prosperity and ease which are still possible for large numbers of people in our own country. No doubt it would be a source of grave concern to Germany if she could realise how normal life has remained in England. The question is whether it is good for ourselves to feel so secure and to take so small a share in the world's martyrdom, in its poverty and loneliness and physical pain. We do not forget the vigilance of our fleet or the vast army of young soldiers we have raised. There are also the nervous strain of a constant anxiety and the dark shadow of incurable domestic sorrows. But take our people as a whole, those who have no personal experience either of the brave adventure or the crushing misery of the war, does the situation occupy their minds almost to the exclusion of everything else? Does it drive out the weakening counsels of prudence and selfish concern for their own comfort or advantage? As the present writer has gone about the country and tried to compare what he has seen and heard with scenes in France and what he knows at first-hand of the martyrdom of the Belgian people, who have lost all except a deathless passion for freedom, the question stares him in the face: Do we realise that all good and noble things are at stake a few miles from our own shores? Are we even now wide awake?

To a certain extent this attitude of aloofness, amounting in some cases almost to insensibility, is inevitable. We are drugged by our own peace and safety into some bluntness of feeling about the miseries of other people. We have heard of these things by the hearing of the ear, but our eyes have not seen them. Our own fields have not been wasted. Our own wives and children have not been handed over to the lust of a brutal soldiery. We still find it easy to comfort ourselves with the thought that these things always happen in war, and probably are not so bad as they are painted. It simply is not true. Sooner or later we have got to make up our minds to look into the bottomless pit of hell. Afterwards there can be no more slumber and folding of the hands.

Then we are drugged by the abundance of our money. How true is the ancient saying that the love of money is the root of all kinds of evil. We do not view the present affluence of large sections of our population with any satisfaction, but rather with grave concern. It is an artificial barrier raised up between them and the miseries of the war. We are living on our capital, and we are doing it extravagantly, storing up a heavy burden of debt which will have to be paid in future years. War profits and war bonuses are no sign of real prosperity. But, meanwhile, they blunt the edge of suffering, and fix our thoughts on money and the things which money can buy, and it is hard for the man who has everything that he can possibly want to make him physically comfortable to realise that this struggle in which we are engaged means starvation and bodily distress, beyond the power of words to describe them, for other people. It would have been easier for us to keep eager, watchful, and alert, if it had been our lot to bear more of the bitter privations of the war.

We must add that there are still many people who are drugged by the power of words and a fatuous habit of criticism. The spectacle of many of our newspapers must be a matter of grave surprise, to use a very mild expression, to those who stand nearer than we do to the grim realities of the conflict. Against criticism which takes the form of well-informed suggestion for improvement no word can be spoken. But the criticism of personal recrimination, of suspicion and innuendo, the cult of pessimism, the unchartered freedom of the grumbler, these things which are always base in public affairs are worse than a national indignity at a time like the present. Who wants to listen to the chatter of a debating society in presence of this epic of death?

We write in this way for a practical purpose. We have little patience left in us for discussion when the world can only be redeemed by action. We want to appeal to any young men among our readers who still shrink from a decision, or refuse to take their place on the side of personal suffering and danger, to beware of a fatal torpor of the spirit. Perhaps some of them who are quite proof against the commoner and less worthy forms of indifference are still the victims of their own theories, and they are often tempted to make it easier to cling to them either by discounting the danger to our own national life, or by throwing mild discredit upon the wrongs which have been suffered by other people. We know that even now such a thing as a noble-hearted pacifism is possible, but it is singularly difficult, and it requires an austere moral sincerity and a depth of self-knowledge of which few men are capable. The young man who accepts pacifism as a practical policy for himself has as his allies every instinct of cowardice, all the deep-seated appetites of safety and physical comfort of which human nature is capable. If he is fearless and true enough to face and conquer them, and also to eliminate all the obstinacy for his own opinions which is a fruitful source of bewildered judgment, he will still find himself in a motley company. For the camp of the pacifists is an easy refuge for slackers of all kinds. Unmanly men are to be found there, and flabby sentimentalists, and those who still believe in the power of words to shield them from their duties. Of course he will want to rid himself of the dishonour of such company, and there is only one way in which he can do it. He must go out from among them into the world of action, where he will have to face such danger and suffering as will test his sincerity for himself and prove it to the world. To remain quietly at home, in business or at college, while others purchase his safety with their blood is a course of action which every man of fine spirit will surely be quick to reject. If he wants to honour his creed and not to bring it into contempt, he must find some way of hard practical service, which other men can accept as the equivalent in personal risk and self-sacrifice of what the soldier is doing in the field. He must show by his deeds that he is not indifferent and only half awake while the world is in agony.

We have deep sympathy with those who suffer from a fatal indecision of conscience, and are pulled both ways,

—if any such still remain in the present crisis. Let us advise them to cease from argument. The time for abstract discussion has long gone by. The choice is quite definitely between two courses of action, to go or to stay. Let us suppose for a moment that on matters of principle the conflicting reasons are much more evenly balanced than is actually the case. It is better to take the nobler risk, and about that there is no shadow of doubt. The acceptance of danger, the offering of life itself for no personal ends but in defence of human freedom and national honour, nothing can dim the splendour of these things. Their glory will survive even in the days when war shall be no more. But inaction has about it nothing which can be counted for righteousness or remain as a source of imperishable pride in spite of possible mistakes in moral judgment. Inaction, after all, is the path of safety so long as other men go in sufficient numbers,—nothing can alter that fact. It may be in a few cases that the hard way of duty seems to lead in the same direction as the coarsest instincts of selfishness. It is a terribly unhappy thing for any man that it should be so. Let him have the courage to distrust his own judgment when everything that is chivalrous and brave is beckoning the other way, lest in the day when the pain which others have borne for his sake has stabbed him broad awake there should be no escape from the gnawing of conscience, no memory of heroic deeds and sufferings bravely borne to shield him from the scorn of his fellow-men.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Abroad in armes, at home in studious
kynd,

Who seekes with painfull toile shall honor soonest fynd;

In woods, in waves, in warres, she wons
to dwell,

And wil be found with perill and with paine;

Ne can the man that moulds in ydle cell
Unto her happy mansion attaine:

Before her gate high God did Sweate ordaine,

And wakefull watches ever to abide;
But easy is the way and passage plaine
To pleasures pallace: it may soon be spide,

And day and night her dores to all stand open wide.

SPENSER.

I cannot praise a fugitive and cloister'd vertue, unexercis'd and unbreath'd, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal Garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the World, we bring impurity much rather: that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That vertue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank vertue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental whiteness: which was the reason why our sage and serious Poet Spenser, whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas, describing true temperance under the person of Guion, brings him in with his palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain.

MILTON.

ALMIGHTY God, who rulest over all the kingdoms of the earth, and on whose gracious Providence we depend evermore for preservation and prosperity; extend, we beseech thee, thy paternal goodness to the people of this kingdom. Our necessities and dangers are all known to thee. Vouchsafe to guide us continually with thy counsel, and strengthen us with thy power, and so direct and sanctify our hearts, that, looking up to thee as our only safeguard and the supreme author of all blessings, we may have the unspeakable blessing of thy Almighty protection and thy heavenly favour. Amen.

OUR RECENT VISIT TO FRANCE.

[SECOND ARTICLE.]

THE next Belgian depots we visited were on the sea coast between Havre and Dieppe.
The first was in a little bay between high cliffs, and on the day we visited it was bitterly cold. The small disused casino in which the men were housed was only built for summer purposes, and was very cold and sunless in winter. They really need a great many things here, but blankets first of all, and these are already on their way. We sent a case of warm garments off from Calais last week, to show them we meant to help them. A French lady living in the neighbourhood had taken an interest in them from the beginning, and she had left a message with the officer in charge to ask him to bring us to see her when we arrived. So we went up to her chateau—a magnificent place in a very extensive park, with a view I have never seen surpassed. The whole of the chateau had been turned into a hospital for French soldiers, and the beautiful ball room, music room, drawing and dining rooms were all wards, while the billiard room was an operating theatre, and most of the bedrooms were also used for serious cases and for the staff. The mistress and her family were acting as nurses. It was a beautiful piece of charity, quietly and simply offered to France, and is typical of many others.

We then went on to the next town where there was a small hospital of about 100 beds, which served for the "relapse" cases from the depot and for accidents and sickness from the large "camp of instruction." There was a distressing lack of all "comforts" here, and the doctor was needing certain instruments, and blankets and slippers were, of course, wanted. He was very hard worked, as in addition to the hospital and the centre of instruction he had the charge of a large colony of refugees. He told me there were about 450 children in the district and that there was no provision for winter clothing for them. He asked me to write to the abbé in charge of them all for details as to wants, and I am now in correspondence with him and shall be able, thanks to the many gifts of children's clothes sent in to send him a good consignment as soon as we know the numbers and ages of the children. It is not strictly hospital work, but it is needed, and that is enough. At P—we found a small depot on the shore, not badly housed, but with an empty stores cupboard,
no warm garments whatever and no slippers. There was attached to it a small hospital for "relapses" and for the centre of instruction near by, and, for the work there, the doctor was very glad to have some help.

We went on to O—which is in the depths of the country, and was very difficult to find. There is room there for 275 patients, and there were 174 there on the day of our visit. It is a curious place—a huge disused factory, which now belongs to the municipality of Paris, and which they use for about two months in the summer to send relays of Paris children for change of air. The beds are children's beds only, and very small for men, but by taking out the footboard and adding a box or a chair, they were not so bad. The chief trouble was the utter lack of any means of warming, but the officers in charge were going into the question and getting out a scheme. There were two Englishwomen (one acting as housekeeper and one as nurse) living in a cottage close by,
and the whole was under the direction of the Anglo-Belge hospital at Rouen whose work in mecano-therapy I described last week. We have sent already from Calais warm clothing and games, and are sending a more adequate supply this week, including blankets and slippers, as their store possessed neither.

On returning to Calais we found a large consignment of goods just arrived from England, including the little motor van for use among the refugees, and for delivering our cases to the hospitals. Several of the hospitals are closing, the two in Wesleyan chapels were on the point of moving out and are now gone, and several in school buildings have to be given up. To meet this emergency, the Belgian authorities have built a hut hospital just outside the Porte Gravelines at Calais, and the General took us round the nearly completed buildings one morning. Each hut is of the same pattern, and contains twenty-five beds. There are, beside, huts for the operation theatres (septic and aseptic), pharmacy, X-ray room, kitchen, laundry, sterilising rooms, dentist, living and sleeping rooms for the staff. They will have 500 beds, with one doctor and two Belgian nurses for each pavilion, and each doctor, besides having charge of a ward, is a specialist or has some department for which he is responsible. It was to open on the 15th so is probably at work by this time. It is a much more healthy situation than in the town, well warmed and lighted for the winter, and altogether a move in the right direction. We are helping them in the equipment where necessary, such as a few basket chairs for men able to sit up, and a stock of slippers and coverlets, but of course the equipment from the hospitals given up goes on there. We went over a similar establishment at B—, which has been already at work for some months, and which we have been able to help with instruments, &c. The design of the whole hospital is admirable and could not be improved for utility and cheapness, and naturally it is all on the simplest possible scale, but perfectly clean and comfortable.

I have been much interested in Calais in Mme. Lageot's school for refugee children, and was very glad to have the opportunity of visiting it. Through the kindness of the War Victims' Relief Committee I was able to give Mme. Lageot a cheque for £25 towards feeding the children this winter, and a further similar amount is to hand now for her, collected by English school children. There were 160 children already at work, in four classes, under soldier schoolmasters unfit now for service, and the children's pride in being taught by soldiers is most entertaining. Their manners and discipline are already greatly improved. Mme. Lageot is herself always on the premises during school hours, and one of the sisters from our little hospital is there most days to teach sewing and knitting to the little girls.

While we were in Calais we packed and sent off thirteen cases of clothes and warm comforts to the depots we had just visited, in fact, entirely cleared out the store. We also visited a hospital at G—, and two actually in Belgium. This last expedition was most interesting as the hospital at C— is near enough to the Front to receive men direct from the trenches, and some cars came in while we were there. It was pitiful to see the exhausted, mud-plastered figures, but, as the doctor said, a bath, food, and a long sleep (twenty-four hours if they wanted it) would make a vast difference; and the wounds, which had already been carefully dressed in the field, would not be touched until the men awoke refreshed. Everything was so quickly and quietly done. The car arrived and a bell was rung. Instantly out came nurses and doctors and helped the patient, who could just walk, into the hut, where he had nothing more to do for himself only to relinquish himself to skilled hands and rest. A paper came with each man giving details of his wound, so that much questioning is avoided, and the doctor takes up the case knowing all the field doctor can tell him.

Later on that same day we were still nearer the trenches and saw the smoke of the German shells bursting over them. We also witnessed a combat in the air between German and Belgian aeroplanes, with the guns from below roaring at them and shots being exchanged between the airmen from their mitrailleuses and rifles. It was just over our heads, and made one realise a little what being under fire means, only in our case we had the excitement without much danger.

With the exception of the field dressing stations, I have now seen the Belgian wounded soldier in every stage of his history until he either returns to the Front or is permanently disabled, and I have always found him brave and taking his hard lot as a matter of course. We do not want him to suffer this winter as he had to do last year. To-day we received a letter from the commandant of one of the convalescent depots, in which he says, "My store room is absolutely empty. I have 98 men and no change of clothes or shoes to give to any one of them. They have only the clothes they arrive in and there is not one game in the place." Another commandant who has already received some things writes overflowing with gratitude for the timely help. Most of these convalescent depots are in very out-of-the-way places, where they never have a visitor. It is difficult for us to remember this when we know how every hospital over here has its local friends who shower gifts on it. There they have no such aids. But the Belgian Hospital Fund is trying to supply the place of that support and to make each commandant and doctor, working as they do in exile and under most difficult conditions, feel that they have friends here who are constantly thinking of them and trying to aid them to complete their work under better conditions but always in their own way.

COMPULSORY SERVICE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It was with great regret that I find myself differing from Mr Arnold Lupton, with whose views on the general policy of compulsory service I am in almost complete agreement, and whose powerful leaflets on the subject I should like to see widely circulated. But where he takes his stand as on a sacred inviolable principle, I seem to see only a shifting balance of public convenience. Or rather, I see a choice between a greater and a smaller sacrifice of the same general principle, and I choose the smaller.

I would respectfully ask, in the first place, how far his principle, that to compel a man to join the army is a crime, is going to carry him. The "crime," I take it, consists either in compelling a man to do what his conscience forbids or in compelling him to take personal risks which he had rather not take; either in compelling him to kill men whom he thinks he ought not to kill, or in exposing him without his consent to the chance of being killed. It is probably on the first that Mr. Lupton would prefer to lay stress. But if so, how does he justify compulsion to pay war-taxes? The pacifist who would allow himself to be shot rather than serve in the army ought also, surely, as a matter of strict principle, to suffer restraint of goods and imprisonment rather than pay taxes which will be spent in paying other men to kill Germans. I admit, of course, and have always insisted, that there is a great difference in degree, that pacifists in general have not imagination enough to realise that they are inconsistent, and that this fact constitutes a weighty reason why, as a matter of policy, we should make them contribute to the war in a way which does not, rather than in a way which does, provoke conscientious resistance. But if the case is to be argued on principle then the only principles that I recognise are (1) that every one who is not willing to dispense altogether with the protection of the State may properly be compelled to do his part towards carrying out whatever measures the Government deems necessary in order to afford that protection; and (2) that in enforcing this obligation all reasonable care should be taken not to exact heavier sacrifices from one individual than from another. From the second of these principles it follows to my mind that compulsion to personal service, which must always be grossly unequal in its incidence, should never be resorted to while the object can be attained by the less unequal method of engaging men by free contract for military as for all other personal services, and then apportioning the cost among all the members of the community by the fairest system of taxation that can be devised.

But I have always recognised that questions of extreme urgency may arise in which this second principle must be subordinated to the first, and men must be forced into the ranks anyhow under penalty of national ruin because they cannot be got quickly enough through the strictly just "fight or pay" system. I believe that such a case of urgency can but seldom arise in a well-managed State, and personally, I am not yet convinced that it has arisen for us. But the question is one of fact not of principle, and the proper judges of the fact are not you, sir, and I, and Mr. Lupton, but the responsible ministers; and our duty, as I understand it, is loyally to carry out their decision, whether we deem it wise or unwise (I refuse to say "right or wrong"). It is a commonplace of history that war cannot be conducted successfully without some kind of dictatorship. Still, I devoutly hope that it may never become your duty or mine to shoot so good a Liberal as Mr. Lupton.—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I am a little surprised to read at the present day a letter like that of my friend, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, which appears in your last issue. I do not wish to protest, I think a protest accentuates the differences between us, which probably exist although we do not know of them, and is very likely to lead to argument in which they would more strongly appear. I only want to utter a word of caution to him and to those who may or may not think with him and who do not see whither his argument is leading them. He seems to forget that, while he rejoices that the B. & F.U.A. does not hold Essex Hall, it holds many funds which have been given to it for the purposes expressed in its constitution. What difference is there between these funds and Essex Hall? He seems to forget, too, that the principles for which Hyde Chapel stands did not save it, it was saved in spite of them by the Dissenters' Chapels Act, for, notwithstanding its principles, indeed because of them, it might have gone the way of the Lady Hewley Charities if it had not been for the Act. What he ought to object to, and what I take it he does not object to, is that the persons holding opinions which are Unitarian are Trustees of Manchester College, Oxford, for fear they should divert those funds to Unitarian objects and not apply them to the dogmatic objects to which that College is devoted. I have used the word dogmatic with intention, and I beg Mr. Dowson not to argue the question whether I am right or wrong. On the side of its undogmatic character he will probably find the Pope and the Archbishop of Canterbury; on the other side I hope to find John Locke and Sir Isaac Newton, or at any rate should hope to find them had they lived and grown until to-day. I hope he will not answer the questions I have put, they are merely cautions to be pondered, but in conclusion I would like to point out that the B. & F.U.A. does not act, it cannot, it is not a living thing; it is the individuals who compose it who act, and I would beg him not to identify them with the principles he attributes to the Association, and not to remove me from the Trusteeship of Manchester College because I am a member of another society where I am, as I think he admits, in my right place.—Yours, &c.,

W. ARTHUR SHARPE.

4, Broadlands Road, Highgate, N., Nov. 14, 1915

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—With the spirit of Mr. Enfield Dowson's letter and of your leading article on 'Our Open Trusts' I am in fullest agreement, but from the practical conclusions expressed I think it is most unfortunately necessary that some one should say a word of dissent. The principle of the Open Trust is the principle of Religious Freedom. It is for that principle far more than for any other that Unitarianism stands and has always stood. It is for the organised support of that principle that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association exists. That is the only "creed" which Unitarianism knows. The Open Trust deed is the sample form of trust deed advocated by that Association—it appears in its 'Year-Book.' How it can be suggested that that Association is not a suitable trustee for (so to speak) its own trust deed is more than I can understand. The objection taken appears in reality to confuse the trust with the trustee. The trustee is merely a legal incumbance made necessary by the fact that the congregation—the beneficiary—is not in law a person, and that a legal person is in law necessary to the holding of property. In the case of a chapel it is the congregation which, in fact, administers the trust. So long as the congregation lives the trustee has no function to perform, except to save the congregation expense by living as long as he can. If a congregation dies it is surely preferable that one of the trustees of its property should represent the current ideas for the time being of the great bulk of those who stand for religious freedom, than that it should, perhaps, be at the mercy of some individual who, even though a Unitarian or Free Catholic, might possibly be a crank.

It is a misapprehension of the substance of the matter to say "the present managers of the Association are entirely loyal to the principle of freedom. But how will it be fifty years hence?" In the first place any alteration amongst the managers (that is the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association) would in no way affect the chapel trust. In the second place the substance of the matter is that the Committee of that time will reflect the opinions of their electorate. If any one believes that in the future Unitarianism (which, together with its group of "kindred" churches alone, I think, in Christendom, stands for freedom) will reject freedom, he has, indeed, little faith in human development. But if there were any such risk, is the risk less that the individual trustees of chapels will be untrue to freedom? I confess I do not think so. If the congregations are in the future going to be untrue to freedom the trustees are of no account. If the congregations are going to be true the trustees have no power. Trustees cannot alter trust deeds.

The battle of freedom has been won so far as Unitarianism is concerned. On that point—if on no other—we are all of one mind. There are grave practical reasons why a trustee who does not die should be available for some of our congregations, as any one who has had to acquaint himself with the existing condition of many of our trusts is painfully aware, and Mr. Dowson may rest assured that the action of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association involves no principle whatever. The "close connection with the Association as trustee" will not "tend to prejudice the theological development of the congregation" any more than my connection as trustee with certain congregations, who neither know nor care what are my theological opinions, tends to prejudice the theological development of those congregations.

Before concluding, sir, allow me to hope that a phrase in your leading article will not be misunderstood. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association holds much property of its own, and hopes, with your help and the generous assistance of your readers to hold much more. It is only real estate with regard to which a restriction is imposed. Even that restriction is not one which the Association desires, but is one imposed by the State with regard to charitable trusts, for political reasons. I lament this controversy. Any substance it might ever have had belongs to the past; it is now merely one of words. We have secured freedom to believe, but we cannot live on that. We can only live on the believing, and these bygone controversies only tend to drive the young away from us.—Yours, &c.

R. MORTIMER MONTGOMERY,

Chairman Civil Rights Committee,

B. and F.U.A.

5, Crown Office Row Temple, E.C.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—If a congregation appoints the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (Incorporated) to be one of the trustees of its property it will have amongst their number, however few or many they may be, one who is avowedly "Unitarian." That is undeniable whatever consequences are involved. What these consequences are, or are likely to be "fifty years hence," cannot be precisely determined; but those of us who, with you, are jealous for the principle of doctrinal liberty may gather reassurance from the following considerations.

'The Essex Hall Year-Book,' prepared and issued by the Association, recommends a model Trust Deed in which (p. 154) the clearest and most emphatic safeguards are inserted against doctrinal limitations, and a paragraph in the Introduction to this draft deed says (p. 153):—

"In drafting a New Trust Deed care should be taken to state clearly that if any question should at any time arise as to the purposes for which the said Church or Chapel may lawfully be used, the widest meaning should be attached to the trust aforesaid, so that neither by reference to the actual or supposed opinions of the founders, nor otherwise, shall any restriction be imposed on the liberty of the congregation for the time being to change its opinions with regard to religious doctrines or modes of regulating worship."

It would surely appear from this that, unless some change is made in the course hitherto recommended to congregations by the Association, the risk to the principle of doctrinal liberty is absolutely nil; and I may be allowed to point to the promptitude with which you and our esteemed friend, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, have called attention to the subject as a sure token that any proposal to narrow the clauses referred to would be at any time vigorously, and I have no doubt effectually, opposed by the friends of freedom.

These being the facts it may be asked why the Association, in adopting for the sake of much convenience the plan of incorporation, has seen fit to include among its powers the acceptance (if desired) of trusteeship, along with others, of property held upon such trusts as are referred to. The answer is just this. From time to time cases have been brought to the knowledge of the Committee of neglect in providing a succession of trustees, of failure to carry out the duties prescribed for them, of loss of deeds and alienation of congregational property. In some of these cases the Committee has fortunately been able to arrest the process of decay and loss, and to prevent the extinction of the congregation; in others the process has gone too far and has proved irreparable. Are we, as a religious community, in such a flourishing condition that we can afford to neglect a reasonable means of preventing such losses?

The point that may be debated (if debate on these things were profitable) is whether the means suggested is "reasonable." I observe from your footnote to Mr. Arnold Lupton's letter on 'Compulsory Service' that you appear to agree with those who hold that considerations of the personal liberty of British subjects should not stand in the way of national self-preservation, and if compulsory military enlistment were introduced you would apparently consider this, if an evil at all, a less evil than national disaster. Perhaps you may agree, on further consideration, that whatever technical defects may be discerned by you or other good friends in the suggested trusteeship by the Association, practical and urgent needs justify its adoption in the cases in view.—Yours, &c. W. G. TARRANT.

Wandsworth, November 15, 1915.

A QUAKER APOLOGIA.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your contributor "Ignotus" in your issue of November 6 has honoured my article in The Hibbert Journal under the above title with notice and criticism. I am grateful for his friendly references but desire to make some comment upon his criticisms.

He says it is "suggestive of the weakness of my position" that I begin by repudiating texts as a final authority, and yet later on discuss them. Does it really show a weak case to be able to support it "by reason and by scripture"? This was the favourite method of controversy in such argumentative centuries as the seventeenth. I appeal to intuition first and to Scripture second, replying to previous articles which accused Friends of slavish literalness.

"Ignotus" goes on to quote against me the text, "If it be possible, as much as in you lieth, live peaceably with all men." The poverty of the textual armoury for war in the New Testament could hardly be better illustrated than that this text should be openly brought forward as a sanction to war. It implies that quarrelsome people exist in private life, and that they may succeed in disturbing our peaceful relations with them, but the passage goes on to say how we are to deal with such. Will it be believed that this is the apostolic solution? "Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but give place unto wrath: for it is written, Vengeance belongeth unto me; I will recompense, saith the Lord. But if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him to drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good." The same passage (in the 12th of Romans) contains the words, "Bless them that persecute you." "Render to no man evil for evil." "Ignotus" is welcome to the text. It gives the Christian method of dealing with private quarrels and inferentially with public ones.

I made it quite clear in my article that I do not hold the principle of absolute non-resistance literally, but that does not prevent my critic from dragging in the well-known hypothetical case of the violated woman and the tortured child, and whether we are to content ourselves with merely verbal remonstrance. This illustration is, of course, necessary to every war argument. The fact that I had already met it did not prevent "Ignotus" from putting it in, for he could hardly have done without it. My principles, as expounded in my article, and still more fully in my recent book on 'War from a Quaker Point of View,' p. 59, would permit me to take, in such a case as that, all the violent action that would be necessary. This, however, is not war, but the maintenance of internal order. I went on, however, to state that force was necessary against lunatics and criminals; but that no foreign nation was a nation of criminals. "Ignotus" says that he regards the Germans as criminals. No doubt a great many people do at the present moment, though in five years' time they will be sorry they ever thought so. We did not, however, go to war on account of German outrages in Belgium and Turkish outrages in Armenia, for the simple reason that they have occurred since. This war is essentially one of the family of Balance of Power wars, and the maintenance of the integrity of Belgium, besides being a humanitarian, is also a British, interest. German brutality is a horrible thing. It is an example, and I am afraid history is full of them, of the spirit of war dominating the whole controlling executive of a nation, unmodified by that humanity which is the most precious growth of modern times. Unfortunately, people who are neither criminals nor lunatics are led thus astray.

At the risk of appearing narrow-minded and "superior" I must still hold my belief that Christian ministers who support even this war are not on their Master's lines. They are on the lines of the Old Testament and of Greek and Roman morality. It is something, however, to be a good pagan, and I have no desire to be hard on them. I have found it sufficiently difficult myself to see my way not to sympathise with those whose conclusion is not my own.

I must refer "Ignotus" to my book for a treatment of offensive and defensive war, and may conclude by saying that his sympathy for the young Friends who have enlisted is quite superfluous. They are not incurring any "risks involved in breaking with a powerful tradition of their community." Few are likely to be disowned, though, as it is a local matter, uniformity of action cannot be ensured.—Yours, &c.

NARROWING OUR IDEALS?

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have to thank Mr. Meade-King for the opportunity afforded me through his letter in your last issue under the above heading (to which I have ventured to add a note of interrogation), of endeavouring to make somewhat clearer certain remarks made by me in the discussion at the Conference on "Public Worship." I brought Dr. Hargrove's passionate protest on my head by a somewhat dogmatic statement (justified at least by my own life experience) that a pure theism will not work. Dr. Hargrove replied that, on the contrary, it could be demonstrably shown that it had worked, for was it not the religion of the Psalms, the Common Prayer Book of the whole Christian world, and was it not, above all, the religion of Jesus? It was. But I want Dr. Hargrove and others to note a very decided difference between the theism of the Psalms and of Jesus and the theism of, say, F. W. Newman and Frances Power Cobbe. The theism of the Psalms and of Jesus was rooted in a national religion which interpenetrated the whole life of the Hebrew on the political, social and moral, educational, hygienic and ceremonial side. It was associated with a theocracy in which Prophet, Priest and King were indissolubly united. It was the very life breath of the national education. It had at the back of it a vast ceremonial, moral and hygienic system, universally accepted by the nation, regulating every detail of a man's life. I do not say that this fact accounted altogether for its efficacy; I do not believe it did. I am sure it did not in the case of Christ. The theism of F. W. Newman, on the other hand, was, in comparison, the merely individual inspiration and nurture of a peculiarly endowed nature. Of such a theism I hope I should be the last to speak with other than a deep reverence. It had been acquired at such cost of labour and devotion, by such largely unaided efforts; it was, in fact, in the main, the sheer product of inmost unmediated communion of the Alone with the Alone. That some fine and rare souls can, and do, find their spiritual nurture in that way none can deny; the Friends offer us here abundant proof. But some of us to-day are overwhelmed with the sense of masses of men, not fine and not rare, who have no experience of such solitary and unmediated communion and who need helping to any such experience through the lowliest, as well as the highest, agencies and aids. These need something they can catch hold of, a Rock to cling to, and rarified air does not meet their need.

Let me cite some facts which have come under my own personal observation. I made a few years back a somewhat thorough study on the spot of the Moral and Civic Instruction given now for more than a generation in the State Schools of France. That instruction has always had, and still has, so far as the requirements of official programmes are concerned, a certain theistic basis. Indeed some of its earliest promoters, including probably the greatest of them, Félix Pécaut, longed and strove earnestly to communicate to it a theistic inspiration through and through. They failed pitifully, as Pécaut pathetically acknowledged, because such a pure theism as he desired, and as he himself was interpenetrated with, could not be linked on to an hereditary foundation of revered memories, ideas, habits, sentiments, associations, deep-rooted in the national life. The teachers felt that they had got nothing to get a real grip on to, for in the teaching of children you need the concrete material. Their theism, if they had any, was too thin. There is scarcely a trace of it left to-day in the State schools of France.

It may surprise Mr. Meade-King to learn that if I were a Christian missionary to Buddhists I should direct them unhesitatingly, at any rate in the first instance, to the Buddha and to their own Scriptures. But I happen to have been born a Christian, and it is natural for me to water my roots in my own soil. And I am proud of my origins.—Yours, &c.

THE POSITIVIST SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—In your issue of Nov. 6 you speak of the Positivist Movement as almost extinct, and make the Manchester Guardian refer to Mr. Frederic Harrison as "a solitary survivor." But the Manchester Guardian spoke of him as a solitary survivor of "the original band of Positivists," which is not quite the same thing. As a matter of fact, the Positivist Committee has now more supporters than it had when Mr. Harrison resigned the Presidency on his retirement from London eleven years ago. I may add that Positivist books have had a larger sale in this country during the last eleven years than they ever had before.—Yours, &c., S. H. SWINNY.

UNITARIAN SOLDIERS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—From time to time the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have had inquiries as to whether an Army Chaplain has been appointed for Unitarian soldiers.

The total number of Unitarians now in the army is considerable; but the number at any one camp or centre, so far as is known, is too small to justify an application for the appointment of a Unitarian chaplain for one camp or district.

Where men are stationed in the immediate vicinity of any of our chapels there is no difficulty, as the local ministers are ready to perform any duties that are required or open to them. Many of the camps are, however, far removed from any Unitarian chapel; and, in order to discover what can or may be done, the Committee of the Association at their meeting on November 10 resolved that the Missionary Agent (the Rev. T. P. Spedding) make the necessary arrangements for visiting the camps at Aldershot and elsewhere for the purpose of interviewing Unitarian soldiers, and conferring with them on the possibility of holding meetings or services, and also providing them with suitable religious literature. In the event of religious services being arranged, Dr. Hargrove and other ministers have very kindly offered to take part in conducting them.

May I invite ministers, secretaries, and Sunday School superintendents to send the full names and military addresses of any soldiers known to them to the Rev. T. P. Spedding, Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.—Yours, &c.

W. COPELAND BOWIE, Secretary.

WORKERS' AID SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—May I remind your readers that the above Society supplies garments for the invalid children at Winifred House, and also sends parcels of warm under-clothing for the poor women and children of our Domestic Missions. I should be glad to welcome new members to the Society. A contribution of two garments yearly and an optional subscription of 6d. constitute membership, and parcels should reach me if possible not later than Dec. 4. Last year the number of garments received compared well with previous years in spite of the claims of war-work, and I trust it may be so this year, and especially that the working parties which so kindly sent valuable parcels may do the same again.—Yours, &c.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS. JOHN DENDY.

THE congregation of Monton Church has sustained a serious loss in the death of Mrs. John Dendy, which took place at her residence, Ewhurst, Swinton, near Manchester, on Thursday, Nov. 11. For some years she had been at times much out of health, but recently had recovered a good deal of her former strength, and had largely resumed her usual activities. She had been taking part in outside work in which she was interested less than a week before her death.

Mrs. Dendy, whose maiden name was Lucy Higgin, was the elder daughter of the late Mr. James Higgin, of Worsley. She married in 1881 John, eldest son of the late Rev. John Dendy. She was connected all her life with the Monton congregation, and her interest in its worship and all its institutions, especially the Women's Union, was unflagging. She also rendered constant and valuable help to the District Nursing Association. Her private charities were many, and calls on her sympathy and practical help met with ready response. She was a woman of a deeply religious spirit and of a fine and cultivated mind, and had singular graciousness and charm of manner which endeared her to a large circle of friends. Much sympathy is felt for her husband in his bereavement.

The funeral service took place at Monton Church on Monday, and was conducted by the Revs. N. Anderton (Minister of the Church) and Dendy Agate. Among the large number present were Mr. John Dendy, Dr. Arthur Dendy (brother-in-law), Mrs. Fowks (sister) Mr. Walter and Mr. William Higgin (brothers), Mrs. Walter Higgin (sister-in-law), Sir Samuel Scott, Bart., Mr. and Mrs. W. Haslam, Miss Beard and Miss L. Beard (cousins), Mrs. Collas (niece) and Lieut. Collas, Mr. Geo. H. Leigh, J.P., Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Nanson, Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Golland, Mr. W. Buckley, Mr. A. Armitage, Mr. G. Murray and Mr. G. I. Murray, Mr. and Mrs.

H. J. Broadbent, Mr. A. Vallance, Mr. Vernon Shawcross and the Misses Shawcross, Mr. R. Wright, the Revs. J. McDowell, W. Fielding, A. W. Fox and Douglas Walmsley, Mrs. Hans Renold, Mrs. and Miss Poynting, Mr. Willis Paterson, Second Lieut. Claude Paterson, and Mr. Ernest and Mr. Egbert Steinthal.

In the course of his address the Rev. N. Anderton said: "The failing health of recent years did but make plain the fine temper of her character and disposition. She was no fretful, complaining invalid, but always looked forward to the time when she would be well enough to resume her varied interests and activities. It was just this eager spirit of sympathy and helpfulness that won our hearts. She felt with all who were in any anxiety, trouble, or distress. The poor, the weak, the ailing, were her children. In her last illness, in her own great extremity, touched to the quick by all that was being done for her, she said, 'How do the poor manage?' That was ever her thought about all who were less fortunately circumstanced: 'How do they manage? What can I do to help them?' Few know how many were befriended by her, how constant and devoted she was in all womanly service." After referring to her life-long connexion with the Church and its people, Mr. Anderton quoted some passages on brotherhood, on self-improvement, and on death, which she had marked in her constantly used copy of Epictetus, and concluded, "We surrender her not to death but to life, and bid her God-speed in the knowledge that she has seen the day break and the shadows flee away."

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is one of M. Vandervelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depots for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Dudley.—Last Sunday, Sergeant the Rev. E. Glyn Evans, who has completed his training in the R.A.M.C., was present, and to the great pleasure of his congregation took part in both services. The preacher was the Rev. W. H. Drummond. There was a large congregation in the evening when Mr. Drummond described the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund.

Guildford.—We regret to announce the death of Mr. G. W. Downes, one of the founders of the Unitarian movement in Guildford, on November 9th, aged 79. Mr. Downes was the son of the late Mr. William Downes, who carried on business as a builder in Guildford for many years, and received his early education at the Blue Coat School, which was held in the tower of Holy Trinity Church. The boys wore leather breeches, blue jackets with swallow tail, and a blue cap with a yellow streamer. One of the caps the deceased wore has been bequeathed to the Guildford Museum, and is believed to be the only one in existence. On leaving school he spent some years with his grandmother, Mrs. Bridger, at Bramley. She was the village doctor, and young Downes acted as doctor's boy. His inclination was to follow the medical profession, but the gift of a chest of tools was the means of discovering his natural bent, and he was apprenticed as a cabinet maker and upholsterer. He remained with the firm for thirty-three years, and subsequently carried on business at Bright Hill almost up to his death. Mr. Downes will be best remembered for the important part he took in placing technical education within the reach of his fellow townsmen in the old days; indeed, he was the pioneer of the technical education movement in Guildford. For many years he conducted classes in art and practical work for builders and carpenters in the premises of the old Guildford Working Men's Institute. He also conducted classes at Woking, and, despite his advancing years, taught at various schools until the end of last year. A good linguist, he taught the French and German languages, and he conducted five or six excursion parties to Paris. He was one of the oldest members of the Guildford Institute, of which he was a trustee, and in recognition of his services he was elected a life member in 1885. A good botanist, Mr. Downes was keenly interested in the Guildford Natural History Society, of which he was honorary treasurer. He was a constant worshipper at Ward Street Church, and served as treasurer for many years. There was a large attendance of his personal friends and the general public at his funeral on Saturday, November 13th. The service in the church and afterwards at the graveside was conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

Leeds.—Mill Hill Chapel.—Temperance Sunday was observed on November 14th, when the Rev. Joshua Lord (Pudsey) conducted a service in the afternoon. The Rev. R. N. Cross, who took up his army duties on the 1st inst., is now stationed with a contingent of the R.A.M.C. at New Barracks, Limerick.

London, Highgate.—A meeting in support of the Belgian Hospital Fund was held on Monday, November 15th, the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth in the chair. Mrs. Bernard Allen read a delightful paper describing the work of the Fund from the beginning. The Rev. W. H. Drummond also gave a short address. On the proposal of the chairman, seconded by Mr. F. Withall, it was agreed that a regular monthly contribution should be sent to the Fund by the members of the congregation.

Newark.—The meeting held in the schoolroom of the Free Christian Church on the evening of Thursday, November 11th, to welcome the Rev. J. Walter Cock, who assumed the pastorate in September last, was noticeable by reason of the number of friends who had come to Newark from a distance to wish God-speed to the new minister and his congregation. The Rev. A. C. Fox, during whose father's ministry the chapel was built, came all the way from Bath, accompanied by the chairman of the Trim Street congregation, Mr. Alfred Taylor, another "old Newark boy," and while these visitors looked, with glad memories, "backward o'er the past," they very effectively summoned their hearers of the new cause to look "forward too with eager gaze." Greetings were also brought from Mr. Cock's former church at Attercliffe (Sheffield) in the person of one of the members, who read a letter from the congregation full of sincere appreciation of Mr. and Miss Cock and of good will for the work at Newark. The North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association (largely responsible for the re-opening of the chapel and for the conduct of the new experiment, in which they are receiving the hearty support of the Unitarian Association), was represented by its president, Mr. E. Wilford, who occupied the chair, and the Trustees of the Chapel by Mr. John C. Warren, of Nottingham, who was accompanied by Mrs. Warren. From the High Pavement Chapel greetings were brought by the minister, the Rev. John C. Ballantyne, Mr. W. R. Hamilton, C.A., and Mrs. Braithwaite (formerly a Miss Castle of Newark), while the Rev. W. R. Clark-Lewis spoke on behalf of the congregation at Gainsborough. Several of the local Free Church ministers sent their good wishes by letter, and one, the Rev. J. D. Burns of the Congregationalist Church, was present, and spoke in very warm terms of the friendship he had already formed with Mr. Cock, and of their agreement in the things essential in religion. The speakers united in congratulating the congregation at Newark on the re-opening of the chapel after its having been closed for three years, and especially upon their good fortune in securing Mr. Cock as their minister; and those who had already had the advantage of Mr. Cock's acquaintance (in some cases his intimate friendship) spoke with the heartiest assurance of his fitness for the difficult task that lay before him, of his warmth of heart, his sincerity and faithfulness in the work of the ministry, and his religious, evangelical zeal. On behalf of the congregation the Hon. Secretary, Mr. A. Stanger, made a lively and delightful speech full of hopefulness for the cause of the Free Faith in Newark, and submitted facts and figures which spoke for themselves. The congregations at the eight services held in March and April had averaged about 25 to 30; and the attendances since Mr. Cock had assumed his post had numbered 26, 36, 42, 80 (Harvest), 42, and 50. In every direction the outlook was hopeful, and the North Midland Association and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association could rest assured that the Newark congregation and committee would do their utmost to support their minister, for whom they already felt the sincerest esteem and affection. About one hundred persons were present at the meeting.

Nottingham.—A meeting organised by the High Pavement Committee for the Belgian Hospital Fund was held in the "Mikado" Rooms, Nottingham, on Friday afternoon, November 12th. Mrs. Bernard Allen was present and delivered an address on the work of the Fund. There was a good attendance and much interest was aroused which showed itself in a collection of £10 and the promise of much future work.

Swansea.—The Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., has been granted leave of absence by his congregation in order to go on foreign service with the Red Cross. He is receiving special training locally and hopes to go out early in January. Mr. W. C. Beynon, B.A., A.R.C.O., the organist of the church, has joined the Inns of Court O.T.C. with a view to active service.

A. M. STODDART. New and Cheaper Edition. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, xvi. + 309 pp. 6s. net.

"There can be no question as to the charm and interest of this volume."—Daily Chronicle.

"Paracelsus remains a great and attractive figure,
an unwearied investigator and traveller, and a writer whose pages are often lit by imaginative beauty and insight."—The Times.

"Here is a splendid book—a life of a Man of Genius."—The Guardian.

LETTERS OF A LIVING DEAD

MAN. Written down by ELSA BARKER. Author of "The Son of Mary Bethel," &c., &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 309 pp. Price 3s. 6d. net.

"Of all the communications we have seen purporting to come from beyond the veil, these are quite the most entertaining, and, from the hypothesis of their authenticity, some of the most instructive. They give a vivid glimpse into life on the other side and some idea of the laws of nature on that plane. . .
With all their romance, they are a quite serious contribution to the life beyond death."—The Christian Commonwealth.

THE BOOK OF TALISMANS,

AMULETS, and ZODIACAL GEMS.
By W.T. and K. PAVITT. Demy 8vo, 292+xii. pp. With 10 Full-Page Plates and Engraved Coloured Frontispiece.
7s. 6d. net.

"It is the most complete record of the various forms these talismans have taken."—The Outlook.

"The subject is of genuine human interest. There is no doubt that the great majority of the human race have believed in the virtues of talismans and amulets; and by a strange recrudescence of superstition in our own time many people have taken to the idea of carrying a 'mascot' for good luck."—Literary World.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE are still greedy for money, but it is not for luxuries but for the charities which ennoble the lives of those who give and help and bless those who receive. A generous contributor to our Belgian Hospital Fund has sent us a most timely suggestion, which we commend to those of our readers who have invested in the War Loan. It is in the following terms: "I am wondering whether the payment of dividends upon the War Loan on Dec. 1st can be turned to good account. Much of the money invested in the Loan consists of war savings; the dividends will be new income and could be devoted to charitable purposes without much or any sacrifice, and to me there seems an appropriateness in applying in such a manner the earnings of money lent to one's country for a purpose not yet accomplished."

MR. JOHN REDMOND, in the deeply moving speech which he made at a recruiting meeting in Queen's Hall on Tuesday, spoke of Belgium in terms which find a deep echo in our hearts. This picture of a desolate land and a martyred people is before our eyes day and night, and no one who has seen this misery face to face, and felt his heart grow hot within him at the wickedness of it all, can rest without doing his utmost to help.

Yesterday [he said] I spent in Belgium. I never in my life felt so thrilled by pity and indignation. Looking out from the Belgian lines I saw in one direction an endless sea of water, where the people had opened the flood-gates and inundated their own lands in order to protect themselves. I was told that it will be ten years after the end of the war before that land can be properly cultivated again. I drove for miles through villages and towns without a single living civilian inhabitant. In some of these towns there are a few Belgian soldiers living in cellars, and not a building standing. Such a scene of desolation and horror you cannot conceive. The bombardment still goes on. In Nieuport, once a flourishing seaside resort, there is not a single civilian inhabitant at the present moment, and the day before we went there shelling had been renewed. There was just one portion of the superb cathedral still standing. But the Germans battered it down the day before I went there. Just outside what was once the front door there is standing now a pillar—fourteen feet high with a crucifix upon it, and although all round there is nothing but ruin and desolation there is not a scratch upon that pillar or crucifix. It is an extraordinary sight. It looked like a new Calvary, and no man could see it without being profoundly touched.

MR. REDMOND went on to speak of King Albert. No king ever inspired a more passionate loyalty. His portrait is in the place of honour in all the hospitals. All the hopes for the future centre in him. He is the true representative of his people and their unconquerable spirit before the world.

I was brought to be presented to the King of the Belgians. There is no more heroic or more tragic figure in the world to-day, or perhaps in the pages of history. He is a man magnificent in physique, in the bloom of his manhood. There he stands alone with a kingdom twenty-five miles long and only ten miles deep, and with the remnant of his people in the trenches. He spends his time entirely in the trenches or in riding about the lines, or in looking into the immeasurable future for some hope for his country and for his people, but with not one quaver in his heart or in his mind. There he stands and will stand, whatever the result will be, for the independence and rights of his people.

WE must not quit the topic of Mr. Redmond's speech without paying our tribute of admiration to its many striking qualities. In force and directness, in quickness of observation and the warmth of its praise for our army in France, in the beauty of its native eloquence it has not been excelled. It will have a tonic effect wherever it is read. There has not been such a heartening speech for many months. We are glad that the most ringing public tribute to our amazing achievement in organizing the new army should come from an Irishman. That is as it should be. How welcome, too, is his picture of the union among Irishmen of different creeds. The boys from Belfast are fighting side by side with the Dublins as true comrades and brother Irishmen. "That is the way to end the unhappiness, discords, and confusion of Ireland. Let Irishmen come together in the trenches and risk their lives together, and spill their blood together, and there is no power on earth that, when they come home, can induce them to turn as enemies one upon another." May we add that it is not only the quarrels between the boys of Belfast and Dublin that will be composed or forgotten when men suffer together and march in company under the banner of a noble cause. That is a fact which every form of sectarianism in religion and politics will have to reckon with after the war.

THE difficult situation in Greece seems to have definitely improved. Very little information has reached the public, and most of the rumours about the terms demanded by the Allies must be accepted with reserve or, perhaps, frankly discredited. It is clear, however, that M. Cochin and Lord Kitchener have not visited Athens merely for the exchange of courtesies. There must have been the argument of force and a possible ultimatum beneath the velvet glove. If we have achieved our object without public threatenings, so much the better. The minimum we can demand is adequate facilities for our troops and proper guarantees for the safety of our communications. These are the essential preliminaries of a campaign. If it is not opportune at the moment to describe the negotiations with Greece in detail, we are at least secure in the knowledge that Lord Kitchener is not the man to sanction a big forward movement until we are in possession of our demands, and are in a position to enforce them should the necessity arise.

LORD DERBY made a recruiting speech on Wednesday which may be described as both breezy and blunt. Both qualities are much needed at the present time. Lord Derby is in a position to trounce the pessimists and the gloomy critics, and those who give information to the enemy under the form of questions in the House of Lords, and he did it with a will, not sparing either the hard knocks or the hard names. On the question of the duty to enlist he made it quite clear that the matter has passed beyond the domain of merely personal choice. It is a question of the need of the country, and every plea for exemption must be judged by a competent tribunal. The man who holds back is, in effect, voting for compulsion and doing his best to prolong the war. "Men," he said "are coming in in large numbers, but I should, indeed, be misleading you if I did not tell you that they must come in in very much larger numbers in the next three weeks if they are going to make the position of voluntary service absolutely unassailable."

THE Bishop of London has taken the strong step of forbidding any of the clergy of his diocese to enlist, no matter how strong and youthful they may be. He would at the same time, if we may judge from his public utterances, condemn the men, whose business it is to control or advise the members of other professions, as entirely lacking in patriotism and a sense of duty if they took a similar line. And so it comes to this that the stalwart young curate is to stay at home while all the young working men in the parish are to go. Is it a decision which is likely to heal the widening breach between working men and the Church or to give organized labour a more favourable opinion of the clergy? The only rational ground upon which it can be defended is the plea that the clergy are a sacred caste, exempt from the common duties which fall to other men and endowed with infallible wisdom for judging in their own case. If teachers and others who minister to the higher life of the nation are rightly expected to accept the verdict that all men are needed, and any instructions let us say from the National Union of Teachers to its members not to enlist would be met at once by strong public action, is it quite seemly that professional coteries of the clergy should decide the matter entirely for themselves and refuse the appeals, which they urge others to accept, because they alone cannot be spared?

WE know that an attempt has been made to construct a line of defence for this attitude by an appeal to ordination vows. The vow is one of unselfish dedication to a particular kind of work, but it does not involve a pledge not to fulfil the manly duties of a sudden crisis. The Bishop of London would hardly forbid his clergy to do the work of firemen in order to save a village from destruction or to man a boat in a shipwreck. He would not even encourage them to hang back to the last possible moment because there are other men for the job. He would like to see them taking the first place in unselfish devotion and practical helpfulness. We are precisely in this position in the war. We want men to fight the flames. We want men to man the boats. Those who come forward to do it are not abandoning one profession for another. They are not in any sense professional soldiers. They are simply doing what is demanded of them at a crisis just because they are men, and they know that they cannot do anything else without unfaithfulness to the primary claims of humanity which underlie all professions.

THE attitude of the Commission of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on this subject is admirable, and might be followed by other churches with great advantage. A resolution was passed recommending the presbyteries to consider sympathetically all applications for leave to enter on combatant service, and enjoining the duty of presbyteries to see that the services of the Church were maintained. A Committee was appointed to give advice and assistance to any ministers who might apply. In this way proper business arrangements have been made to meet the emergency. If the churches had had sufficient imagination to see what was happening in the world, they would have taken steps before now to put themselves on a war-footing by organising help for congregations whose ministers desire to go, by pooling their funds, or by arranging the time-table of services so as to enable one man to serve two congregations. The young minister would not then have been left with the burden of a difficult and lonely decision, leading in many cases to months of hesitation. He would have felt the force of practical sympathy behind him and the assurance that his work would not suffer in his absence. It is not too late even now for something effective to be done in this direction.

A GOOD deal has been said this week both in Parliament and the Press about the need of a national campaign of thrift. Our artificial prosperity, with high wages and war profits, is leading many people to spend their money lavishly and foolishly. It is in present circumstances a real national danger. But most of us need some guidance. We ought to understand something of the significance of large financial operations upon the prosperity of the country. We also want some practical instruction about our own expenditure. A great deal of useful information will be found in a pamphlet by Mr. Hartley Withers on 'War and Self-Denial' (J. M. Dent & Sons, price 2d.) We quote his conclusion, and hope that many people will lay it to heart:—

Sooner or later we shall have to do without things because, if we do not do so voluntarily, our scrambling among ourselves and against the Government for a limited supply of things to be bought, will put prices up, and make us take less for our money. Surely it is better when our country is fighting the biggest war in history for the greatest cause that ever was fought about, to help this cause by saving of our own free will. If we can learn from the war to work hard, live hard, and think hard, we shall face the difficult problems that peace will bring with a unity of purpose and a store of productive energy that will take us a long way towards their solution. At present the only things that we can afford to spend money on are health, and understanding, and victory.

RUDYARD KIPLING ON THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE.

THE flood of war books continues in a monotonous stream, and most of them concern us very little. They are common place and professional. If we read them it is with the hurried glances which we bestow on the headlines of the newspaper at the breakfast-table. But here and there the soul of the war, its noble passion, its terrible scorn, its glowing sense of the presence of good in things evil, have found their way into the printed page, and speak to us with a human voice. Anatole France has that secret and Maurice Barrès; and in our own country the sonnets of Rupert Brooke, and now this small volume by Rudyard Kipling have accomplished the same thing. You can buy it for sixpence and slip it into your pocket and read it in an hour. But at the end something fresh and vital has bitten its way into your mind, a picture of France in her agony, her moral strength, and her indomitable hope.

No one but Rudyard Kipling could have written it. It needed a man familiar with the life of armies, who has called the common soldier his friend, and knows what a man's soul is like when danger and death have stripped it bare and reduced it to its simplest terms. It needed also his practised hand, his economy in the use of words, the vigorous realism of his art; and above all, the sincerity which makes the mind capable of receiving impressions without imposing its own judgments upon them. He tells us here what he has seen, what others of us have seen or dimly guessed at, of France at war. Will our people at home, behind their barricades of security, understand and learn its lesson?

We must not pause here to describe these strongly etched pictures of the army in the field and the population behind, all working together with a sort of tense quietness and perfect mutual understanding for the one end. It must suffice to refer to some of the impressions which the book, without a word of moralising about our English ways, drives home upon ourselves. For France there is a sense of danger in the air—not that she doubts for a moment that she will win; but she is fighting for her life. The whole country is on a war footing.

"All France works outward to the Front—precisely as an endless chain of fire-buckets works towards the conflagration. Leave the fire behind you and go back till you reach the source of supplies. You will find no break, no pause, no apparent haste, but never any slackening. Everybody has his or her bucket little or big, and nobody disputes how they should be used. It is a people possessed of the precedent and tradition of war for existence, accustomed to hard living and hard labour, sanely economical by temperament, logical by training, and illumined and transfigured by their resolve and endurance."

And the women are mobilised as well as the men. They are not troubling about wages and separation allowances and the comfort of their homes. In face of an overmastering duty they are not weakened by anxiety for the future. They have given their men to the war, and the only thing that remains for them to do is to give themselves.

"The women...work stride for stride with the men, with hearts as resolute and a spirit that has little mercy for shortcomings. A woman takes her place wherever she can relieve a man—in the shop, at the posts on the tramways, the hotels, and a thousand other businesses. She is inured to field-work, and half the harvest of France this year lies in her lap. One feels at every turn how her men trust her. She knows, for she shares everything with her world, what has befallen her sisters who are now in German hands, and her soul is the undying flame behind the men's steel."

But her invincible idealism has not forsaken the soul of France in this grim business of fighting. Neither concern for physical safety nor fear of the brutalities of the Boche could have produced this union of hearts. There is a fire of patriotism, which has nothing in common with national egotism and dreams of possessing the earth. It has in it something human, universal, deeply respectful of the rights and liberties of others. "There is," as Mr. Kipling reminds us, "a thing called the Honour of Civilisation to which France is attached." That is why, for her, this is a war which must and can have only one end. An impassable gulf has opened before her into which everything noble she has achieved, every dream of good for herself and humanity she has ever cherished, will go down to destruction, unless the nation fights as one man, and fights till it wins.

There is one passage in this book which will startle many readers by the naked force of its challenge to our complacency. It is in the form of a conversation with a French officer.

"One of them said: 'Our national psychology has changed. I do not recognise it myself.'

"What made the change?"

"The Boche. If he had been quiet for another twenty years the world must have been his—rotten, but all his. Now he is saving the world."

"How?"

"Because he has shown us what Evil is. We—you and I, England and the rest—had begun to doubt the existence of Evil. The Boche is saving us."

There is terrible irony in the thought that this price had to be paid in order to bring us back to the hard world of things as they are. Religion has wandered too long in a land of pleasant dreams. It has spoken to men of peace and happiness and the delights of an earthly paradise. God has been worshipped as divine goodness in a world where sin has ceased to trouble us, and there is no need to be stern any more. Once again we have been shown what Evil is; and Evil requires not comfort, or even a philosopher to explain it, but the opening of the books of judgment and a message of redemption. But first its cruel menace must be checked. It must measure its strength against nations inspired by a common moral passion to fight for the ancient loyalties of the soul. In this struggle nothing is of any avail but a man's whole life. When the honour of civilisation and the cause of public righteousness are at stake it is not for us to make conditions but simply to obey.

VERSE.

PITY AND PATIENCE.

For Pity, human Pity, Giver of all, we pray;
For Pity, and for Patience
To bide the evil day.

They cry, the bruised and broken,
The lonely mourn their slain,
From land to land is echoed
The litany of pain.

Ah, many a hand is ready,
And many a heart is kind;
But ever the need of Pity Leaves Pity far behind.

For boundless human Pity,
For Patience, brave and strong,
We pray amid the darkness—
O Lord, how long, how long?

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

THE CHURCH UNIVERSAL.

I BELONG to the Universal Church: nothing shall separate me from it. In saying this, however, I am no enemy to particular churches. In the present age of the world it is perhaps best that those who agree in theological opinions should worship together; and I do not object to the union of several such churches in one denomination, provided that all sectarian and narrow feeling be conscientiously and scrupulously resisted. I look on the various churches of Christendom with no feeling of enmity. The Romish Church is illustrated by great names. Her gloomy convents have often been brightened by fervent love to God and man. Her St. Louis, and Fénelon, and Massillon, and Cheverus; her missionaries who have carried Christianity to the ends of the earth; her sisters of charity who have carried relief and solace to the most hopeless want and pain; do not these teach us that in the Romish Church the Spirit of God has found a home? In the English Church we meet the names of Latimer, Hooker, Barrow, Leighton, Berkeley, and Heber; in the Dissenting Calvinistic Church, Baxter, Howe, Watts, Doddridge, and Robert Hall; among the Quakers, George Fox, William Penn, Robert Barclay, and our own Anthony Benezet, and John Woolman; in the Anti-Trinitarian Church, John Milton, John Locke, Samuel Clarke, Price, and Priestley. To repeat these names does the heart good. They breathe a fragrance through the common air. They lift up the whole race to which they belonged. With the churches of which they were pillars or chief ornaments I have many sympathies; nor do I condemn the union of ourselves to these or any other churches whose doctrines we approve, provided that we do it without severing ourselves in the least from the Universal Church. On this point we cannot be too earnest. We must shun the spirit of sectarianism as from hell. We must shudder at the thought of shutting up God in any denomination. We must think no man the better for belonging to our communion; no man the worse for belonging to another. We must look with undiminished joy on goodness, though it shine forth from the most adverse sect. Christ's spirit must be equally dear and honoured, no matter where manifested. To confine God's love or His good spirit to any party, sect, or name is to sin against the fundamental law of the kingdom of God, to break that living bond with Christ's Universal Church which is one of our chief helps to perfection. CHANNING.

Thereof it comes that these faire soules, which have
The most resemblance of that heavenly light,
Frame to themselves most beautiful and brave
Their fleshly bowre, most fit for their delight,
And the grosse matter by a souveraine might Tempers so trim, that it may well be seene
A pallace fit for such a virgin Queene.

So every spirit, as it is most pure,
And hath in it the more of heavenly light,
So it the fairer bodie doth procure
To habit in, and it more fairely dight
With chearefull grace and amiable sight;
For of the soule the bodie form doth take;
For soule is forme, and doth the bodie make.

SPENSER.

ALMIGHTY GOD, the fountain of all wisdom, who knowest our necessities before we ask, and our ignorance in asking; we beseech thee to have compassion on our infirmities; and those things which for our unworthiness we dare not, and for our blindness we cannot ask, vouchsafe to give us in the fullness of thy watchful care for all our wants.

AMEN.

A BELGIAN WORK OF SELF-HELP.

WHEN we were visiting the Belgian Hospitals at Dinard last August, we were much pleased to find that many of the wounded soldiers were busy at work, and greatly interested in making raffia baskets. We made inquiries about it, and found that this work had recently been started by the Baronne Robert de Brocqueville, the daughter-in-law of the Belgian Minister of War. We had previously seen a workroom for Belgian women started by her in Lannion, where shirts, trousers, &c., were being made for the army, so we were interested in again meeting her work. We found she had a house in Dinard which was used by her for the purposes of the "Œuvre des Belges," as her society is called. On calling there we found Madame de Brocqueville, the President, and M. Geo. Sohier de Bert, a Vice-President, who very kindly welcomed us and showed us all their work. Madame de Brocqueville founded the society as long ago as October, 1914, with the object of giving help in clothes and money to the wounded and refugee Belgians in Brittany, and also to provide work for both Belgian and French refugees. She has founded workrooms in different centres, employing about 100 women who earn from one to one and a half francs a day, and knitting is also given out to those women whose duties keep them at home. She also employs a number of shoemakers, and repairs on the premises thousands of pairs of boots. As there are many lacemakers among the refugees she has provided them with the necessary materials, such as thread, and a great quantity of beautiful Valenciennes lace has been made. This has chiefly been sold in Paris and America, and in a shop attached to the Society's office in Dinard.

We were shown all the storerooms for the finished articles, and were greatly struck by the methodical and business-like way in which it was all managed. Madame de Brocqueville had noticed, as we had frequently noticed in our own hospitals, that the men who were only slightly wounded, or who were well on the way to convalescence, found time hang heavily on their hands, and breaches of discipline were often caused by lack of occupation. She decided that basket-making with raffia would be suitable amusement, and a few men were taught how to do it and sent round to the hospitals to teach others. This handicraft was chosen because the materials are cheap, and it is possible to attain considerable skill and produce the best results in a very short time. We were shown the cellar where Madame herself, with her helpers, dyed the raffia to many beautiful colours, and this is then given out to the workers. The finished baskets we saw were charming—beautifully finished and in many colours. They are mostly suitable for small work-baskets, with or without covers, and were from six to eight inches in diameter. The difficulty was to find a market; so as the work seemed quite a definite piece of hospital work, I undertook to sell as many as possible in England. I am now daily expecting the first consignment. Through the kindness of Miss Brooke Herford I am to be permitted to have a stall for them at the Brabazon Sale in Hampstead on December 10 at the Parish Church Room, by the Drill Hall, one minute from the Hampstead Station (Tube). It has occurred to us that, perhaps, some of the ladies in other parts would take a few—perhaps a dozen or so—and sell them among their friends at working parties or in any other way. The price will be marked on each article in English money. I shall be very glad to send parcels to anybody who will help Madame de Brocqueville in this way in the most excellent work she is doing for her own country people, and especially in providing pleasant employment for the wounded soldiers in hospital.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Will you allow me to thank Sir Roland K. Wilson for kindly recommending my leaflets written against Conscription, and to express the pleasure I feel that he is also against Conscription, though his opposition is on the ground of expediency rather than of principle. He does not accept my principle that Conscription is contrary to personal rights, and, therefore, wrong; he says, in effect, that if I admit that the State may take my money and spend it as it likes, so I must admit that the State may take my body and work it, flog it, chop it into little pieces, or burn it, just as it pleases. He does not stop to form a syllogism, he draws a general conclusion from a particular premise and omits the major premise, if there is one. Having thus gaily disposed of my principle, he then lays down two principles of his own which I would briefly paraphrase as follows:—(1) Every person who accepts State protection must do whatever the State deems necessary. (2) The State, however, must not "exact heavier sacrifices from one individual than from another." In principle (2) I thought I should find salvation, but Sir Roland has no sooner enunciated this principle than he proceeds to discard it, and he sets up two other principles. The first is the doctrine of "extreme urgency." The Ministers of State are to be the only judges of this, common people like ourselves are to submit. Men who have had great experience of the practical work of life are to yield their opinions on a practical question to smart lawyers who have but little experience of the practical working of a civilised community. Now, Sir, I venture to suggest that the doctrine of "extreme urgency" has been the excuse for almost every crime that statesmen have committed, and is the excuse for German "frightfulness" in Belgium and the sinking of the Lusitania.

Now we come to his last principle:—"War cannot be conducted successfully without some kind of dictatorship"; but history teaches me that in the great wars of a hundred years ago the United Kingdom was governed by a Constitutional Parliamentarily supported Ministry, that our chief enemy, Napoleon Bonaparte, was a dictator of the cleverest sort the world has ever known; but he and his country were defeated and crushed by our Constitutional State, and the history of the last sixteen months teaches me that the Constitutional Parliamentarily supported Governments of the United Kingdom and France have so far beaten "some sort of a dictator" in the person of the Kaiser, who has lost most of his colonies, all of his ocean trade, the flower of his young manhood, and will shortly be compelled to sue for peace, if only the unanimity hitherto prevailing in this country is not broken by the reckless panic-mongering of Conscriptionists. I, therefore, make Sir Roland a present of his principles, but accept with gratitude his present advocacy of the Voluntary System.—Yours, &c.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I was heartily glad to see the Rev. H. E. Dowson's letter on the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as Trustee. It was a fine trumpet-blast to those faithful to the principle of the open trust, an essential corollary to which is the necessity of a succession of trustees representing and reflecting the changes of thought and opinion in succeeding generations, and administering their trust in the light of advancing thought and knowledge. I regret that a controversy such as this should occur at a time when every ounce of spare energy is required in the great national struggle we are engaged in, but it is those who are seeking to introduce this new departure at this time who must bear the responsibility. It is of course true that trustees cannot change their trust; but it is equally true that the administration by trustees of an open trust may vary (as the poles asunder) according to the openness of mind of the trustees to new truth and living thought. I have had, in different capacities, some considerable experience of Open and Free Trusts and their administration, and I know that there are many of them in which the trustees have, and exercise, very considerable powers which are by no means confined to the mere holding of the property and investments to be administered and applied by others.

The main objections to a corporate body, such as the British and Foreign Unitarian Association now is, acting as trustees for chapel and other open trusts seem to me to be:—

(1) The succession of individual trustees represent, reflect and are acted on by, the advancing movements of thought and belief, each new generation of trustees living in and moving with the times; whereas the Association by its doctrinal name and constitution is to some extent stereotyped and limited in its power to change and advance. It continues generation after generation, remaining in its place on the trust no fresh trustee succeeding it, as is the case with personal trustees in each succeeding generation.

(2) The personal trustee can attend meetings and give a personal vote or word of advice. How can the Association attend and speak and vote at a meeting of trustees? Are the other trustees to wait until the Association's Committee have decided how the Association is going to act; or is their representative to go to the meeting with definite instructions, whatever other trustees may urge; or is every meeting to be dependant for its decision on the Association confirming their actions? Indeed, there will be a crop of administrative difficulties in a trust administered by a board of trustees of which the Association is one and individuals are the others.

(3) The smaller and weaker congregations or trusts are the most likely to take advantage of the proposal; and who can doubt that the Association as one of the trustees will have an overwhelming voice in decisions of the trustees. It is in this connection to be remembered that the Association has large funds at its disposal.

(4) Where there is no obligation to keep up the number of trustees to a minimum number there would be a tendency to save trouble or expense, as the other trustees died out, by not appointing other trustees, and the Association always continuing would become more and more the controlling influence and even, maybe, the only surviving trustee.

(5) No one would think of appointing a Unitarian as a trustee with the condition (if it were possible) that his place when he died must be filled by a Unitarian. But this is practically what would be done in appointing the Unitarian Association on the trust. Imagine an open trust, on which was imposed the condition that every trustee appointed in the future must be and call himself Unitarian.

I am convinced that the step contemplated will tend to narrow and hinder the development and advance of the free Churches, and to put a new barrier, and that a serious one, in the way of the progress of truth and freedom for which these churches have stood and lived for generations. I should feel it my duty, wherever I have any influence, to resist to the uttermost any attempt to put the Unitarian Association on the trust.

May I, in conclusion, appeal to the Members of the Association to reconsider the matter? They must admit that where such a stalwart as Mr. Dowson challenges the proposal, there is argument for pausing. What has been done in the matter can be undone.

At the least, it does not seem too much to ask for a pledge for reconsideration, and that in the meantime, till peace once more blesses the nations, no action in carrying into practice the proposal shall be taken. The delay could do no harm, and would give opportunity for deliberate consideration, impossible under present conditions.—Yours, &c.,

A. H. WORTHINGTON.

Manchester, November 23, 1915.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The protest raised by Mr. Dowson is not so easily nor so convincingly settled as some of your correspondents appear to think. Mr. Arthur Sharpe puts certain questions to Mr. Dowson, not, as he pleads, to be argued or answered, but to be "pondered." It might be well if certain other questions were put to Mr. Sharpe on the same condition—to be "pondered." For instance, is it not a strange anomaly that a dogmatic association (an association to which I myself belong) should offer itself as their trustee to undogmatic churches? And again, is it not quite unfitting that an association of individual subscribers, an association in whose management the churches as churches have no voice, should be their trustee?

May I also ask Mr. Montgomery to ponder again whether the substance of Mr. Dowson's protest belongs, indeed, only to the past? Freedom is never a past issue. It may be more easily lost than won. The price is eternal vigilance.

Mr. Tarrant thinks that a church will find comfort in the fact that in appointing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association as one of its trustees it will have at least one who is "avowedly Unitarian." But where is the comfort in that if the church having an open trust becomes Trinitarian? Why "one avowedly Unitarian" except to try and put a spoke in the wheel of a church wishing to become something else? These also are questions to be pondered.—Yours, &c.

JOSEPH WOOD.

Crowborough, November 22, 1915.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It appears to me undesirable that an Association which exists primarily for the diffusion of principles of one particular form of one particular religion should be the trustee of buildings which are to be absolutely free for the worship of God. Such an Association may have no legal power over the religious life of the congregation but its position as the trustee must give it undue influence. Can any one doubt, for example, that when the proposal is made to label such a building as "Unitarian" the fact that the Unitarian Association is the trustee will count for something? If the recommendation to make the Association a trustee is carried out, it will at least be necessary to provide additional safeguards in the Trust Deed. Mr. Tarrant calls attention to the paragraph in the Introduction to the Model Trust Deed in the Essex Hall Year-

Book, "In drafting a New Trust Deed care should be taken to state clearly," &c., but I cannot find in the deed itself any such statement as there follows in the Introduction. A clause should be at once inserted in the Model Deed for the guidance of congregations, providing "That neither by reference to the actual or supposed opinions or objects of the founders or of the trustees, for the time being, nor otherwise, shall any restriction be imposed," &c. I am afraid it is not likely that any congregation will be much influenced by my opinion on the general question; but I do hope that the Association will see to this additional safeguard, and get it not merely into a paragraph of suggestions but into the body of the Model Trust Deed.

I do not quite understand why Mr. Sharpe has dragged Manchester College into this controversy, but as he has begged Mr. Dowson "not to argue the question whether he is right or wrong" in what he says, will you allow me to say that I also am a trustee of Manchester College, and, as such, I beg to state "with intention" that the College is not "devoted" to "dogmatic objects," and to add that I have not the slightest objection to Mr. Sharpe or any one else undertaking "to argue the question whether I am right or wrong" either in your columns or elsewhere.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

WALTER BAGEHOT.

THE WORKS AND LIFE OF WALTER BAGEHOT. 10 vols. Edited by Mrs. Russell Barrington. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 75s. net.

WALTER BAGEHOT has had to wait a long time for the glory of a collected edition. He died in 1877 and his fame, except among the small company who value the enduring qualities of good literature, has already become a legend rather than a living memory. There were reasons of a private nature which made a biography of a more elaborate kind than Mr. Hutton's sketch undesirable for many years. The appearance of the Life by Mrs. Russell Barrington last year revived interest in his writing and possibly stimulated the book lover's desire for something more handsome than the series of odd-sized volumes with which many of us are familiar. It is no doubt unfortunate that work of this kind should make a fresh appeal to us at a time when our minds are preoccupied with other things, and book buying is at a discount. On the other hand 'Lombard Street' and the long series of articles reprinted here from The Economist have a special significance just now when the ordinary citizen is more conscious of the stupendous tasks of national finance than he has ever been before; while the literary criticism, which belongs to the school of common sense and human sympathy, is less likely to be frowned out of court by the disdain of the professional scholar. Bagehot's mind, with all its rich endowment, was essentially practical. He was the man of business, let loose in a library. He wrote for pleasure, not for a livelihood. There is in consequence a tone of freshness and buoyancy and a complete absence of academic pretension in his excursions into literature. He never lost touch with the personal and the concrete or forgot that even the greatest books in the world were written by men of like passions with ourselves.

This quality is nowhere more in evidence than in the well-known essay on 'Shakespeare—the Man.' There he goes the length of trying to establish it as a principle that good books are seldom written by professional students:—

"The first author, it is plain, could not have taken anything from books since there were no books for him to copy from; he looked at things for himself. Anyhow, the modern system fails, for where are the amusing books from voracious students and habitual writers? Not that we mean exactly to say that an author's hard reading is the cause of his writing that which is hard to read. This would be near the truth, but not quite the truth. The two are concomitant effects of a certain defective nature.... What separates the author from his readers will make it proportionably difficult for him to explain himself to them. Secluded habits do not tend to eloquence; and the indifferent apathy which is so common in studious persons is exceedingly unfavourable to the liveliness of narration and illustration which is needed for excellence in even the simpler sorts of writing."

It may seem strange that this exceptional insight into the human elements in literature was combined with weak democratic sympathies. Bagehot would probably have replied that keen interest in his ploughman or his gamekeeper as a man did not in the least blind him to the value of human differences. Observation taught him that only a few are born to rule. This, however, does not go to the root of the matter. His attitude was partly a matter of temperament. He had some cavalier blood in his veins which gave him a romantic attachment to aristocratic traditions. For the same reason he tended to view life too much in compartments. Society existed for him, as it did for many of his Whig contemporaries, in graded classes and he had no ambition to break down the barriers. He had the greatest admiration for the shrewdness and energy of the untutored mind, but education in any rich meaning of the term must, he thought, be restricted to the few. "It forms the opinions of people that can form the opinions of others." There is in consequence an element of hardness and detachment in his political writing, if we judge it from the point of view of the social idealism of the present day. But it is impossible to differ from Bagehot even on matters of this kind, where for many of us the difference is quite radical, without accepting his challenge to formulate our reasons. His positions are never merely prejudices. He always forces us to think.

We cannot forget in this place that the Letters on the French Coup d'État of 1851, which first brought Bagehot into notice as a writer of originality and force, appeared in our own columns. Even to his intimate friends he was something of an enfant terrible in those early days. Here is Richard Hutton's racy description of this interesting chapter in our own history:—

"In 1851 a knot of young Unitarians, of whom I was then one, headed by the late Mr. J. Langton Sanford—afterwards the historian of the Great Rebellion, who survived Bagehot barely four months—had engaged to help for a time in conducting THE INQUIRER, which then was, and still is, the chief literary and theological organ of the Unitarian body. Our régime was, I imagine, a time of great desolation for the very tolerant and thoughtful constituency for whom he wrote; and many of them, I am confident, yearned, and were fully justified in yearning, for those better days when this tyranny of ours should be overpast. Sanford and Osler did a good deal to throw cold water on the rather optimist and philanthropic politics of the most sanguine, because the most benevolent and open-hearted, of Dissenters. Roscoe criticised their work from the point of view of a devotee of the Elizabethan poets; and I attempted to prove to them in distinct heads, first, that their laity ought to have the protection afforded by a liturgy against the arbitrary prayers of their ministers; and next, that at least the great majority of their sermons ought to be suppressed, and the habit of delivering them discontinued almost altogether. Only a denomination of "just men" trained in tolerance for generations, and in that respect, at least, made all but "perfect," would have endured it at all; but I doubt if any of us caused the Unitarian body so much grief as Bagehot, who never was a Unitarian, but who contributed a series of brilliant letters on the Coup d'état, in which he trod just as heavily on the toes of his colleagues as he did on those of the public by whom THE INQUIRER was taken.... Crabb Robinson, in speaking of him, used ever afterwards to describe him to me as 'that friend of yours—you know whom I mean, you rascal!—who wrote those abominable, those most disgraceful letters on the Coup d'état—I did not forgive him for years after.' Nor do I wonder, even now, that a sincere friend of constitutional freedom and intellectual liberty, like Crabb Robinson, found them difficult to forgive. They were light and airy, and even flippant on a very grave subject. They made nothing of the Prince's perjury; and they took impertinent liberties with all the dearest prepossessions of the readers of THE INQUIRER, and assumed their sympathy just when Bagehot knew that they would be most revolted by his opinions. Nevertheless they had a vast deal of truth in them, and no end of ability."

Well, we have forgiven the "impertinent liberties" long ago. It was a small price to pay for one of our proud memories. These ten handsome volumes are a worthy monument to one of the most original minds of his generation.

SICILIAN STUDIES. By the Hon. Alexander Nelson Hood (Duke of Bronte). London: George Allen & Unwin, 5s. net.

THE man who has once breathed the air of Sicily and filled his eyes with its feast of colour, is greedy to renew the enchantment, even though he can only do it through the printed page. The English books on the subject are numerous, ranging from solid histories like Freeman to the insipid chatter of the globe-trotter tricked out with coloured plates. Mid-way between the two is the small group of essays and studies by writers like Mr. H. Festing Jones and Mr. Nelson Hood, who know the people and the land through long and intimate contact. Mr. Hood's new volume has all the charm of familiarity, he writes about men and manners and the scenery of the island not as a tourist but as a fellow citizen; and he is also delightfully discursive. Here are dream-pictures of Etna and the earthly paradise over which she presides like some vestal queen, and adventurous stories of brigands, and descriptions of the grim terror and misery of the days that followed the earthquake. There is also an interesting account of a revival of the Agamemnon in the Greek theatre at Syracuse. Sicily is a land of legends, and perhaps for that reason it is a land of superstition. Its Catholicism, for all its fervour, is of a pagan type. Local saints abound and are rich in devotees. In few places is it so easy to trace the thread of continuity which binds the present to a far-off past or to recognize the presence of the ancient gods in the local customs of the Christian church. These things revive for most of us in the ceremonies of Christmas, with their ancestral memories and their symbolism of the changing year. But for the Sicilian peasant they are a familiar part of daily life. He is still a pagan at heart. For him it is not true that great Pan is dead.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE are making good progress with their Standard Edition of George Meredith. The two volumes just issued are 'Diana of the Cross-ways,' and 'The Egoist' (6s. per vol.) 'The Egoist' is surpassed in dramatic interest by others of Meredith's novels, but it stands unrivalled in its psychological subtlety and its uncanny power of unmasking a man to himself.

LITERARY NOTES.

MR. C. DELISLE BURNS has followed up his recent little volume on 'Political Ideals' with a book entitled 'The Morality of Nations,' based on lectures delivered for the Oxford University. The book is not intended to establish a completely new theory of the State, but is an endeavour to offer a criticism of inherited conceptions of the State, a review of the present moral relationship between States, and an indication of the tendencies which are transforming the whole of international politics. It will be published this month by the University of London Press. The same publishers also announce, among other forthcoming books, 'A Short History of Modern Europe, from the French Revolution to the Present Day,' by Mr. E. L. Hasluck; 'An Economic Geography of the British Empire,' by C. B. Thurston, B.Sc.; and a 'Handbook of Industrial Law,' written at the suggestion of the Executive Committee of Ruskin College, Oxford, and prominent members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, by Mr. John H. Greenwood, Barrister-at-Law, author of 'The Law Relating to Trade Unions,' and other works on Industrial Law.

MANY of our readers will be glad to know that the moving address delivered by Mrs. J. Collins Odgers at the Annual Meeting of the Unitarian Women's League in Whit-week has been published in the form of a booklet, with a reproduction of Watts's well-known picture as a frontispiece. It is an earnest plea for a return to the method of spiritual renewal through silence and prayer, "and occasional withdrawal from the noise of the conflict," which too many of us have abandoned in the rush and tumult of modern life, and never was there a time when such a message was more urgently needed. This little book is just the thing to send to a thoughtful friend at Christmas time, and certainly every member of the Women's League should make herself the possessor of it. Copies may be obtained at the Book-room, Essex Hall, or from the Liverpool Booksellers' Company, Lord Street, Liverpool, price 2d.

WE understand that the Secretary of the National Conference has arranged for the issue of Prof. Gilbert Murray's address on "Ethical Problems of the War," which appeared recently in our columns, in pamphlet form. It will be ready shortly, and friends who wish to have a large number of copies for distribution should communicate with the Rev. James Harwood, 60, Howitt Road, Hampstead, London, N.W., at once.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is one of M. Vandervelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depots for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

THE LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY. AUTUMN MEETING.

THE Autumn Meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday, November 24, at 6.30. In the absence at the beginning of the proceedings of the President, DR. C. HERBERT-SMITH, MR. A. A. TAYLER occupied the chair.

MR. TAYLER proposed from the chair the adoption of the proposed new rules, each item being submitted to the meeting and agreed to separately. The alterations are of a purely technical character.

THE REV. J. ARTHUR PEARSON, who dealt with the various aspects of the Society's activities, said there was very little that was fresh to say about the work of the Society which went on very much in the same way from one year's end to another, with its disappointments, its joys, and its satisfactions. A good deal of work was maintained consistently in which the Society did not now help at all, its aim being to foster the healthy spirit of independence which was operating at Kentish Town, at Woolwich, Peckham, and elsewhere. There were, however, other churches which could not be regarded as self-supporting or self-directing as yet, at Leytonstone and South Norwood, churches in being and in essence whose membership was small, but whose effectiveness could not be finally measured by the numbers attending for worship Sunday after Sunday. Continuing, Mr. Pearson urged that the spirit of perseverance should characterise their efforts. Wherever they had got their foot in, there, he thought, they should stay, waiting for the fruits of their labours however long it might be before they could see the results they were striving for. Valuable work had been done at Walthamstow, Stratford, and Forest Gate by the Sisters, who had recognised the importance of training the girls as well as the boys and founded groups of Girl Guides with excellent results. Very little had been heard of the Pioneer Preachers of late; their former leader had joined the Church of England, and the personnel had changed; but the spirit of their work was the same, and their loss would be serious, indeed, for the London churches. In this time of the nation's need they ought to give special thought to the Society's future, for from the churches it had helped to found young men had gone out to play their part on the larger fields of service in a way which must gratify all who had any respect for honour and justice and truth among nations as among individuals. It was appalling to think how many bright young lives had been withdrawn from the arts of peace to follow the art of war; but it was left to them to see to it that the coming generations should be worthy of the sacrifices made by those who had laid down their lives in the spirit of their fathers.

DR. HERBERT SMITH, who presided over the latter part of the meeting, also delivered an address. What, he asked, were the prospects that awaited them after this war was over? People were sometimes heard to say that they were tired of the war and no longer read anything about it. That was a silly attitude which those who were connected with societies like theirs' could not afford to take up. They must look the facts in the face and see what kind of outlook awaited them in the future. To begin with, the country was threatened with the greatest financial crisis that any country had ever had to meet. The leading financial authorities were horrified at the prospect. It was obvious that people who hitherto had been fairly comfortably off, but were now only able to simply maintain existence, would not be in a position to give assistance to projects which they had supported in the past. He believed, nevertheless, that Unitarians had got sufficient interest in their own work to make them endeavour by all means in their power to keep that work going. He himself wanted the London District Society to do its best because it was a denominational society. He did not advocate denominationalism in a narrow sense, but he believed in having a flag and fighting for it.

The greatest question, however, was, how was the war going to affect the religious life of England in the future? He believed that, first of all, the war was going to draw people closer together. Mr. Redmond had said that at the front the "Dublin boys" and the "Ulster boys" were fighting shoulder to shoulder, and they all knew what that meant. Men of all religious opinions were facing the same dangers, and after that experience, was it likely that the old relations which had existed between them before the war would be maintained? It was nonsense to suppose such a thing. They would come back with many of their angles rubbed off; there would be much more give-and-take between them, and they would have a much deeper religious spirit as a result of facing danger and death side by side in the trenches. That spirit would constitute the biggest national asset after the war. The English people as a whole were an intensely religious people, and the old Puritan spirit had never died out, but was always reasserting itself. But they must remember that when the men came back, though he believed they would be more religious, that did not mean that their feet would be set in the old grooves once more; they had got to the bed-rock of things, they had found answers in their experiences to many of the questions they had often asked themselves in the past, and in this new expansion of ideas they would not care a rap about the theological problems which had once seemed so important. For this reason, any religion which was founded on really rational lines would have no difficulty in getting adherents to support it, because the men who were coming back would be just the type that needed its help. Unitarianism was faced with a greater opportunity than it had ever had before, and he, the speaker, was most anxious that they should regard the work of such a Society as theirs as an almost sacred duty in view of the future that lay before them.

MR. A. A. TAYLER, Chairman of the Executive Committee, endorsed the remarks of the President, and urged that the work should be carried on with all the greater zeal because they were really acting as stewards of a great trust in the absence of many who were serving the national cause, and of whom they were reminded by the empty chairs on the platform. The best thing they could do was to let those absent ones feel that when they came back everything had been done that could be done to further the objects for which the Society existed.

THE REV. A. A. CHARLESWORTH, Chairman of the Missions Committee, made a special plea for increased financial support. They had a deficit of £250 which, had it not been for several circumstances, including the fact that there was no minister at Acton, would have been much greater, and the position was one of urgency. If there was not a substantial increase in their financial resources, there would have to be a complete re-organisation of the work which they had been able to do up to the present, and which they hoped to continue. It would be a grave misfortune if sacrifices were not willingly made to enable the Society to extend its work and let the spirit of free religion express itself in places where now they were not directly represented.

MR. ARNOLD LUPTON added a few words on the financial situation, which he did not think would be quite as serious as many believed, and which, with ordinary prudence, the nation ought to be able to meet. He thought that, whether supernaturalism or rationalism prevailed at the end of the war, they would have the advantage, because a spirit of inquiry would be raised which would lead men to their churches to hear what they had to say about the new situation.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bristol.—A public meeting was held on November 11th at Lewin's Mead Chapel to welcome Dr. Tudor Jones, the new minister, Mr. J. T. Dannel, treasurer of the church, presiding. Those present included Dr. Hargrove (President of the National Conference), the Rev. Rudolf Davis (representing the Western Union), Dr. G. F. Beckh (Oakfield Road Church, Clifton) and others. Numerous letters of apology for absence were read by Mr. J. T. Underhill (assistant treasurer), including one from the Rev. A. N. Blatchford (formerly minister at Lewin's Mead), the Rev. A. Copeland Bowie, the Rev. Basil Martin (Chairman of the London Ministers' Society), and Dr. Blake Odgers (Recorder of Bristol). The chairman extended a warm welcome to Dr. and Mrs. Jones; and Mr. C. G. Price, on behalf of the Sunday School; Mr. T. Gaylard, as Missionary of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission; the Rev. R. Davis, on behalf of the Western Union; Dr. Beckh and Mr. F. G. Long (Oakfield Road), also spoke, expressing hopes for the future which were born of a work for the Liberal Religious faith at Lewin's Mead extending over 250 years. The Rev. Lewis Johnson, as a minister of another denomination, added a few cordial words, and Dr. Hargrove gave a brief record of Dr. Tudor Jones's work in New Zealand, where, he said, he not only succeeded in building a church at Wellington, but made it a living church. He came to Bristol as the successor of men who had ministered to congregations there since the year 1662. There was a consciousness throughout of progress, for revelation was not given once and for all. God revealed himself to men in every generation, just as they were capable of receiving him. They had no desire to make the city a Unitarian city, but to work for it in every way open to them, praying that his kingdom might come on earth as in Heaven. Dr. Jones, in the course of his reply, referred to the fact that it was in Bristol that he started his public career as a Unitarian, for he spoke at a meeting of the denomination at the Victoria Rooms on his pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism. He alluded to the social life of the world to-day, and said it was no good for any church in the city to preach a Gospel that was in the air. They wanted the driving power of religion, the intuition of God in each one of them, something that was beyond intelligence, beyond the conclusions of human knowledge. He hoped that Lewin's Mead would be known by the community of spiritual brotherhood that he hoped would be established there. The meeting closed with the National Anthem.

London, Brixton.—A Congregational Meeting was held at Effra Road Chapel on the 21st inst., to receive the resignation of the minister, the Rev. G. M. Elliott, owing to his approaching ordination in the Church of England. A resolution was passed expressing the respect and esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Elliott were held, and appreciation of their active work for the benefit of the Church. The congregation, respecting sincerity of conviction in whatsoever direction it may lead, wished Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Godspeed in their new sphere of work.

London, Essex Church.—A Workers' Circle has been formed to supply articles required for the Belgian Hospital Fund, and several parcels have already been forwarded. An open meeting is announced for Thursday, December 2nd, when Mrs. Bernard Allen has kindly promised to visit the circle and speak about what the Fund is doing. The meeting will be held in Lindsey Hall. Tea will be supplied at 4 o'clock and the address will be given about 4.30.

London, Kentish Town.—A Sale of Work was held at the Free Christian Church on November 11th in aid of the church funds, Miss Tagart performing the opening ceremony. Parcels of goods from the stalls have been sent to Stratford and Walthamstow Sales of Work, to John Pounds' Home, and to the Belgian Hospital Fund.

London, Bethnal Green.—The forty-eighth Annual Gathering of Old Teachers and Scholars was held in the Mansford Street schoolroom on Saturday afternoon, November 20th. For forty-seven years this Re-union has been held on the first Wednesday evening in November, but this year, owing to the darkness of the streets and the uncertainty of trains, a change was made, and the meeting was fixed for a Saturday afternoon. There was a large attendance, including a good number of old scholars and teachers who had come some distance to meet old friends. A very enjoyable afternoon was spent. A short programme of vocal and instrumental music, kindly arranged by Mr. Clark, was much appreciated. On Sunday last, at the evening service, the members of the congregation enjoyed the privilege of hearing an address by Mrs. Bernard Allen, describing the work and the needs of the Belgian Hospital Fund. A special collection, taken on behalf of the Fund, amounted to £7 10s.

Mottram.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop has tendered his resignation and expressed the desire to be set free of the charge of the Mottram Church next month.

Preston.—A short time ago the Rev. Mortimer Rowe acquainted his committee and congregation with the fact that he had felt it his duty to enlist in his appropriate class in the Army Reserve, and he asked them, moreover, to consider the further question of whether he might be released for immediate service instead of remaining until the calling up of his class. A meeting of the congregation was accordingly held after evening service last Sunday, at which Mr. Rowe's request was considered, and a recommendation from the chapel committee adopted, releasing him in the near future, when the necessary arrangements are made for the pulpit work in his absence. The congregation unanimously pledged themselves to do their best for the continued life and work of the church. Mr. Rowe briefly thanked them for their courageous resolve, and said that his request was the outcome of a conflict between two opposing duties—to stay, and to go; he felt that in his case the latter was the clearer duty. All being well, Mr. Rowe hopes to be able to join the R.A.M.C. in December.

Sheffield.—A recent Sale of Work in connection with Unity Church, Crookesmoor Road, was opened by Mrs. Blake Odgers, Mrs. W. R. Stevenson presiding in the unavoidable absence of Mrs. E. Bramley. Mrs. Stevenson said they unfortunately found themselves compelled to use the proceeds of the Sale in reduction of deficit on current account, instead of in reduction of the Building Fund debt. It was expected that by January next the deficit on current account would be about £135. They were very hopeful that the Sale would enable them to devote all future efforts of the kind towards the larger debt. Mrs. Blake Odgers, president of the Women's League, said at the present times the duty of all had been made very clear—to increase output. There was no place where that necessity had been more firmly grasped than Sheffield. For the churches such a thing meant that they should go on with all their good work, and with the things worth doing, not allowing them to languish despite the multiplicity of other present-day calls on time. They ought to keep their religious home fires burning for the hero soldiers when they came back. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin (minister) moved a vote of thanks to Mrs. Odgers and Mrs. Stevenson. On the second day the Sale was opened by Miss Amy Hobson (Sheffield), with Mrs. W. King in the chair. The proceeds amounted to about £120.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LATE BOOKER WASHINGTON.

Booker Washington was such an ardent exponent of the gospel of work, and self-help, that it was often objected by those who were interested in the future of the negro that he did not pay more attention to the political claims of his race. There seemed to many, also, something a little crude and materialistic in his insistence on the necessity of showing a good balance at the bank, and proving that the coloured man could get on in business and acquire property like his white brothers, as if affluence and position were everything and ideals nothing. But the tendency to sentimentalise over the negro has often been his bane, and it was as well that he should be told by one of his own race that cleanliness and orderly habits and the desire to possess a decent home and make himself respected in the community were absolutely essential to his progress. Booker Washington knew what he was talking about, for he was born in a log-cabin 14ft. by 16ft., with an unboarded floor, and he has himself said that he never knew what it was to sleep on a bed raised above the ground and furnished with proper bedding until after the emancipation of the negroes had taken full effect at the close of the Civil War.

MRS. ASQUITH AT HAWARDEN.

A very characteristic description of a visit to Hawarden written by Mrs. Asquith in 1889 is published in the November Cornhill Magazine. This observant visitor, who got on splendidly with the grand old statesman, lay awake one night thinking about her host, and this is how she summed him up: "His temperament is extraordinarily optimistic; he told me himself that he never had had low spirits in his life; nothing but a continuation of bad weather could affect his spirits. 'Nature must speak to me, and speak to me kindly.' It seemed strange to me to have no moods. His critical faculty is not fine. Anyone knowing him and wishing to impress him as clever could easily impose on him. He is impersonal, interested in the topic whether he reads of it in The Star or hears it spoken of by Newman. He does not want to hear what you think but what you know, he therefore seldom asks you a question and you need never betray yourself; a woman would have to be very stupid or very honest to persuade Mr. Gladstone that she was not 'a remarkable woman.' It would be hard to say where the dominant interest of this man is, but I am sure it is not in his mind. It is in his temperament. He believes in Life as much as he believes in Immortality; he respects it, he has glow and faith, blazing courage. His impatience and steam-power appeal to me. He is dangerously plausible to himself as well as to other people. He has no idea how much he loves power. It is his passion. It has come out of his heart into his head. At times it has carried obstacles away, at other times it has carried him away. He has got too near what he was working at, he is out of proportion. Lord Acton once said of him that he was a good judge of the country, a fair judge of the House of Commons, and no judge at all of his intimates and family. Mr. Gladstone said just the opposite about Lord Beaconsfield to me one afternoon out walking. 'Dizzy was a wonderful judge of his immediate surroundings, friends, secretaries, officials, &c., not a very good judge of the House, and absolutely no judge of the country.' Mr. Gladstone is enthusiastic, and collects enthusiasm. He goes in for it, as it were, and supports it. He believes in things and sees visions. This will always attract ordinary as well as unordinary people. The more you are able to believe the more you see."

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart.

The object of the Movement is to heighten and sustain the spirit of the Nation in the long struggle against Germany—a struggle in which this country is fighting, not for her own safety and honour alone, but for the interests of the whole world; for a right ideal of free civilisation against a wrong ideal of organised power—the battle of humanity.

Among those engaged actively in the movement are: Sir Henry Newbolt, Prof. Gilbert Murray, Dr. L. P. Jacks, Dr. J. E. McTaggart, Prof. Caroline Spurgeon, Mrs. Stuart Moore (Evelyn Underhill), Mr. Gervase Elwes, &c.

A Series of Meetings is now being held on Sunday Afternoons at 3 o'clock, at the Æolian Hall, New Bond Street, W., to inaugurate the Movement, to be followed by similar Meetings in all parts of the country. Those who wish to support the Movement can do so by communicating with

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE are drawing near to Christmas, and we are beginning to wonder whether we are going to reach £10,000 for our Belgian Hospital Fund. We know the urgency of the demands made by other funds, and the shortage which taxation is creating in our surplus money. But the special channels of help which we have opened up require constant supplies and will continue to do so until the great day of restoration comes for the Belgian people. We must continue to share though our own money grows less, that is the true way of generosity. Nor is it wise to forget, amid all the new appeals of human misery which tear our hearts, that concentration of effort is usually the truest philanthropy. Efficiency multiplies kindness. That is what our readers have learned to expect from the Belgian Hospital Fund. You place your money where you know it will be spent to the best advantage and do the maximum of good.

THE strength of our Fund from the beginning has been in the wide diffusion of interest. It has had churches and schools and working-parties and a host of private donors and the hearts of little children behind it from the beginning. In that way it is broad-based upon the people's generosity, and does not depend too much upon large gifts, many and gracious as these have been. It will have been noticed by many of our friends that we have recently started a campaign of speaking in the country. Addresses are given at week-day meetings and there are often special sermons and collections on Sunday. This week-end Mrs. Allen is speaking at Birmingham, Liverpool and Southport, and Mr. Drummond is to plead for the cause at Norwich on Sunday. Our object is to give our friends first hand information, to convey to them the gratitude which is their due from the patients and staffs of the Belgian hospitals, and of course to stimulate further generous effort.

THE situation in Greece has hardly changed, so far as the public eye is concerned, during the past week. We have always maintained that in a war like this between rival principles of civilisation real neutrality is practically impossible. This is conspicuously the case in a country like Greece. The more she tries to play simply for her own interest and safety without reference to the larger issues of the conflict the more she seems to be dragged into the whirl-pool of contention. She cannot accept the minimum of the Allies' demands without a threat of invasion from Germany, and she cannot refuse it without becoming acutely conscious of the menace of our fleet. The position is a pitiable one, though she brought it on herself when she broke her treaty and sacrificed her pledged word to the blind instincts of fear. We believe that whatever the consequences to Greece may be the situation will be handled firmly by the Allies. Nothing else is possible in the interests of honour and justice.

THAT is all the commentary which at the moment it is possible to write on the situation, and we all feel that it is vague and unsatisfactory. We are naturally impatient for something dramatic to happen and a clear way to be opened for us to come to the rescue of the Serbians. It is, however, a situation in which the amateur criticisms of people in a hurry are of singularly little service. Those of us who are spectators of events do not always remember that statesmen are men like ourselves, and that their hearts are torn like our own by the spectacle of human misery. They are not callous or indifferent because they have learned to reject the emotional remedies or the heroic audacities, for which some of us clamour, because they know that reckless action creates more ills than it cures and caution is often the true handmaid of justice.

WE need not take the bombastic utterances about the Serbian campaign in the German official press too seriously. Germany has a great belief in the virtue of shouting, and is still obsessed with the idea that if she only shouts loudly enough she is certain to get her own way. It suits her political schemes to announce in the most grandiloquent language that the Serbians are crushed and the campaign is at an end. No doubt she intends the fact to be duly noted in Greece and Roumania. Meanwhile the Serbian army, which has suffered terrible losses and fought with almost incredible bravery, has not been captured and has no thought of surrender. Germany has no more finished with Serbia than she has finished with Belgium. There will be a day of reckoning.

It is hard to believe that Germany has any military pride in what she has done. She has crushed a small nation by the force of overwhelming numbers, and she has given the world another picture of the odious savagery with which she carries on war. Terrible stories are coming to hand of the flight of the civilian population of Serbia before the invader. Can even the most hardened Prussian regard them as evidence of the political value of frightfulness? We quote part of the message sent by Mr. William G. Shepherd from Salonika on November 27 :—

The entire world [he says] must prepare to shudder when all that is happening on the Albanian refugee trails finally comes to light. The horrors of the flight of the hapless Serbian people are growing with the arrival here of each contingent from the devastated district. They say that nearly the whole route from Prizrend to Monastir is lined with corpses of human beings and the carcasses of horses and mules, dead of starvation, while thousands of old men, women, and children are lying on the rocks and in the thickets beside the trail exhausted and foodless awaiting the end.... At night the women and children, ill-clad and numbed with cold, struggle pitifully about meagre fires of mountain shrub beside the trail, in the morning to resume the weary march toward their supposed goal of safety—Monastir. But by the time this despatch is printed Monastir, too, may be in the hands of the enemy. This will leave them to the mercy of the inhospitable mountain fastnesses, where for the past two days a terrific blizzard has been raging, and to the Bulgarians.

SIR JOHN SIMON made a strong attack upon The Times and The Daily Mail in the House of Commons on Tuesday. He pointed out that they had persistently misrepresented the strength and spirit of this country, and had been used extensively by Germany in order to impress neutrals with a sense of our weakness and incapacity. No amount of captious criticism or special pleading will get rid of the gravity of these charges. We may leave the question of motive entirely out of account. If it is true that articles from English newspapers have been reprinted by Germany as part of an anti-English propaganda in the Balkans and elsewhere, we are face to face with a very ugly fact. Any attempt at justification only increases the offence. Full apology for a bitter mistake and a promise not to offend in the same way again is the only course for honourable men to take. Unfortunately, the Harmsworth Press is still busy praising its own virtues, though behind its brazen countenance we hope that there is some dawning sense of the depth of its shame.

We know that this is strong language, but we are quite unable to understand the temper of any man who discovers that his pen has played the part of traitor to his country and still keeps a smiling face. Sir John Simon's speech was clearly intended as an appeal to public opinion to take a very serious view of offences of this sort, and an intimation that if the warning is disregarded, stern action may be necessary. We are sorry to say that in the debate which followed the usual platitudes about the sacred freedom of the press duly appeared. Is it seriously contended that the manufacture of adulterated food is a crime, while the manufacture of adulterated news which poisons the minds of our Allies, alienates neutrals, and helps to prolong the war, is only a legitimate exercise of journalistic freedom? Men who talk in this way are the victims of their own phrases. They fail to see that there are occasions when doctrinaire opinions must yield to robust commonsense.

AN important conference on the need of national economy was held on Wednesday. It represented the Trade Unions of the country, and was addressed by the Prime Minister, Mr. McKenna, and Mr. Runciman. There was some plain speaking about the rise in wages since the beginning of the war and the tendency to make further demands, a subject upon which we have ourselves ventured to utter words of grave warning. We have to realise that the nation has not got a bottomless purse. Every class of the community must carry its full share of the financial burden of the war and feel its weight. We cannot get through without a risk of financial disaster on any other terms. As we anticipated the tendency to demand higher wages to cover the increased cost of living, which was encouraged in many quarters in the early days of the war, has created a habit of expectancy that more and still more will be forthcoming. It has also done a great deal to deaden national sensibility to the grim and terrible aspects of the war, what it will cost us to win, what an unspeakable disaster it will be for the world if we do not put the full strength of the country into it and achieve a decisive victory.

ON this subject of wages Mr. McKenna spoke with special emphasis. The wage-earners will only respect him more because he has honoured them with plain words. His most telling point was that the tendency to look for increased wages is most insistent in Government work for the army and navy, and he asked the pertinent question whether it is right to increase the price indefinitely of just those articles which our soldiers and sailors must have—munitions, artillery, clothes, and food, by an indefinite demand for increased wages. The question of expenditure, which in many places where money is abundant, has become lavish and foolish, also came in for some wholesome advice. The idea that to spend money on articles of home manufacture is good for trade, and, therefore, good for the country, is a delusion in war-time. "We want the whole of our capital and labour that can be spared for the essential services of the nation engaged in the war, and when we divert that capital and labour to supply unnecessary goods, then we are injuring the country." There is the case for economy in a nutshell.

THIS appeal for greater economy in the use of our money applies specially to personal expenditure. It is there that our standards have gone up enormously in recent years. No man of large heart will begin to save out of his charities. He will feel, rightly, that the national life has spiritual interests as well as material, and these must be maintained. Hospitals, schools, and—above all, churches, have to be supported, if the whole tone of our common life is not to be lowered. Of course none of these institutions will launch out into costly schemes of expansion. They will keep themselves well within their necessary expenses and watch for possible economies with a jealous eye. The money which a short time ago might have gone into new buildings must be spent now on works of comfort and healing for the sick and wounded, and all who suffer in the war. Here and there, however, special appeals are justified, and this is certainly true in the case of the old chapel at Deptford, which was re-opened last Saturday. It has taken £1,000 to make it secure, and if the work had not been done it would have had to come down, for its walls had been condemned as dangerous. That would have meant not only the disappearance of an ancient house of prayer, with many noble memories, but also the closing of a centre of religious life in a neighbourhood of mean streets which needs all the forces of goodness to combat the temptations which drag men down. We commend the Appeal, which appears in our advertising columns, to the attention of our readers.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS.

BY THE EDITOR.

SOME curious attempts have been made lately to put theological students in a class by themselves so far as the duties of citizenship created by the war are concerned. A certain number of professors of theology have made themselves responsible for letters or manifestoes in the public press, in which it is pleaded with engaging simplicity that their students stand in a different category from other people's students. It may be remarked that private judgments of this kind are of little value at a time when we are trying to cultivate a deeper sense for public virtue, and have agreed as a people to refer all cases of difficulty and hesitation to a more impartial tribunal than that of our own profession. The theologians would win more respect for wisdom if they left it to other people to treat the young aspirant for the ministry as such a valuable asset for the future, that he must not be exposed to the dangers which are the essential duty of other men.

Some people will possibly regard me as a little lacking in respect for my own training and profession when I refuse absolutely to lend any support to these special pleadings of learned men. So far from being impressed by them they fill me with deep concern for the future of religion in this country. Are we still so dull of heart that we cannot see what is happening in the world, and allow anxiety for the future to cripple us for the heroic duty of to-day? Is our religion so lacking in vitality, and our theology so much a matter of academic precedents, that they will not be safe in the hands of men who have looked death in the face and risked their lives for the sake of the brethren? Next week the great effort to secure enough volunteers will come to an end. Many theological students, I am glad to say, have gone; but others of you are still hanging back, for reasons which, no doubt, seem to justify you in leaving the vindication of our national liberties and the defence of your own homes and the chivalrous succour of the oppressed to other men. You cannot be offended with me if I try to tell you quite simply why I think you are mistaken. It is a time for great plainness of speech between man and man.

And, perhaps, I may plead that I have earned some small right to speak to you. I have more reason than most men to hold the ministry in deepest reverence and honour, to be jealous of its good name, and to strive to keep the ideal which has been handed down to me untarnished. I have also seen many years of service, and, like others who have tried to do their duty and seen life in many aspects, I have many precious things laid up in my heart. But the sacredness of the ministry and the respect in which men hold it must depend not on any official status but on what it is. I want to see it win growing power and influence because it is nobler than the noblest, better than the best, always first in the field when hard duties must be done. The men who are most unselfish at the present moment, most careless about risk for themselves, will make the best ministers in the future. Of that, I think, there can be no doubt. Out there in the camp and the trenches, or lying wounded in hospital, they will learn things which College can never teach them. By accepting your full share of it all you will be doing the greatest honour to your future ministry.

Do not misunderstand me if I venture to warn you of some of the dangers to which you are exposed during your college life, and perhaps, never more so than at the present moment. Here, again, I speak from experience, for I have a fairly intimate acquaintance with the life of the theological student, its friendships, its joys, and also its subtle perils. You are not ministers yet. Do not behave as though you were. Live a free open life with other men, and give full weight to their judgments. It is hard to keep a theological college free from the atmosphere of a seminary, with its professional aims and its tendency to judge by standards which are not better, but are somehow different from those of the outside world. Probably you do not detect anything of the kind in yourselves. You would hate to be regarded as half-fledged priests, who can hardly be expected to be as manly and robust as other men. Well, my moral is that you must not be content in present circumstances simply with an inside judgment. If you want advice about your duty by all means go to your professors, but if they are quite content that you should remain where you are, do not imagine that that settles the question. Go, if you can, to some outside friend as well, who is entirely free from any professional prejudice in the matter. If possible let it be a man whose own sons have enlisted, and see whether you can hammer out with him reasons which he will accept as valid for you though quite inadmissible for his own highly gifted boys. That is a severe test, but it is one from which no sincere man ought to shrink before he takes the path of refusal.

What I am driving at is this, that for the sake of your own manliness you must have good reasons if you refuse to serve your country in its hour of peril, good, that is, not merely for yourself but also for other people. For you will have to give some account of yourself at the bar of public judgment. You cannot treat yourself as a private person whose conduct concerns nobody else. None of us can do that now. Unless the reasons you allege can win the assent of people who are your equals in seriousness and intelligence, you will be very likely to be set down as a cranky or feeble-minded man who is only fit to be a parson. It may be grossly unfair that any one should even hint at such a thing, but the danger is there, and you have to guard against it, not simply for your own sake, but still more for the sake of religion.

Let us then glance at some of the reasons which are alleged for exempting theological students from war service. They may be classed as personal, professional, and matters of principle. Private and personal reasons played a considerable part with all of us in the early stages of the war. We had hardly grasped the magnitude of the issue, or cut ourselves loose from the cherished plans and ambitions which it is impossible for high-minded men to indulge any longer. Not only our private interests but also the claims of family and affection have to give way in face of the national demand and the cry of wrong for redress. But the theological student must see to it that he does not allow these private motives to influence his actions because he is sheltered from a good deal of criticism, and his future profession is regarded by many people in the light of extenuating circumstances. It is for him to be a shining example of unselfishness and freedom from private-mindedness.

I must also say a word about professional scruples. I do not refer to the feeling that you must not stain your hands with deeds which are the plain duty of others, for, I believe, that very few of you really believe that you are a sacred caste separated from the common life of men. I mean rather the belief that your future profession has claims upon you with which nothing must be allowed to interfere, because you are to be among the trained men who will be so much needed after the war to heal the wounds of human sorrow and to stand forth as intellectual champions of the faith. Does it never occur to you that it will be many years before you are at all competent for these tasks? Have you ever reckoned with the possibility that men may prefer for their teachers and consolers those who have themselves drunk the cup of this agony? And, meanwhile, what of all the instincts of chivalry in your heart? Have you no answer to the call of martyred Belgium, and the slaughtered Armenians, and the trail of corpses on the snow clad hills of Serbia? Don't be anxious at a time like this about the future of religion and a trained ministry. All the treasures of the soul are safe in the keeping of the men who sacrifice everything to do their duty. They, and not those who stay at home, are the real defenders of the faith, the creators and inspirers of the future.

But you remind me that some of you are pacifists, and consequently, nothing I say has any effect upon you, for military service is against your conscience. For a genuine pacifism I have a deep respect, though I do not agree with it. I have known a few quiet, deep-souled men and women of that type. In their presence I feel that I am on holy ground. Their faith is not one of easy phrases or neat platitudes. It has been won through suffering. But there is a pacifism of a much commoner type, which does not impress me, I will not say with its genuineness, but with its depth. It talks in tones of easy self-confidence, and is fond of announcing to an astonished world its readiness to be shot. If you take your stand on pacifism be sure that you have really faced all the terrible difficulties of your creed. If you go to bed at night thankful that the country is secure from invasion, if you are glad that our army stands between your sisters and sweethearts and the infamies which have befallen the sisters and sweethearts of Belgium, you are not genuine pacifists. You are only confessing your readiness to accept the blood of other men as the price of your own security. I am not posing you with an imaginary case. A short time ago a friend of mine was talking to a theological student who professed to be a stout pacifist. When she asked him what he would do if our country were invaded he at once exclaimed, "Oh, I hope that it will not come to that." But that is the dread possibility with which you and your pacifist principles have to reckon. You cannot at the present time be pacifists with any sincerity of soul unless you deliberately accept murder, pillage, and outrage, in which your own nearest and dearest may be the victims, as a less evil than resistance. I do not say that such a creed is impossible, but I venture to doubt whether a man who realises in the depth of his soul what it means could remain quietly at college. It would drive him forth in passionate longing to make some of the pain his own. He could not accept his own security at the hands of other men without also paying his price. This is not rhetoric. It is the sober reality of our everyday life, so terrible are the times in which we live.

But I have talked to you too long already, and you will lose patience. What I have said has not been prompted by any desire to judge you or to impute blame to anybody. I owe far too much to the companionship and confidence of men younger than myself to play the part of a mentor. It is possible that I have seen the tragedy of the war at rather closer quarters than some of you, and in view of the awful need, and for the sake of the things which are most sacred to us all, I simply want to help you, if any word of mine can do so, to be the manliest of manly men. My last word is this—Don't take yourselves too seriously. Believe that you are quite ordinary like the rest of us, and have sufficient humour to put yourselves in the place of the other fellows when you are tempted to claim exemptions which cannot be given to them. Above all, live in high-hearted fellowship with all sorts and conditions of men, sharing their thoughts and allowing them to rub your angles down. Such noble companionship is the best kind of university. If you want it you must seek for it in the camps and the trenches, for in these days you will not find what is brightest and most inspiring in the young manhood of England anywhere else.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

HYMN FOR A PROGRESSIVE PEOPLE.

Great and fair is she, our Land,
High of heart and strong of hand;
Dawn is on her forehead still,
In her veins youth's arrowy thrill.

Hers are riches, might and fame,
All the earth resounds her name;
In her roadsteads navies ride:
Hath she need of aught beside?

Power Unseen, before whose eyes Nations fall and nations rise,
Grant she climb not to her goal
All-forgetful of her Soul!

Firm in honour be she found,
Justice-armed and mercy-crowned,
Blest in labour, blest in ease,
Blest in noiseless charities.

Unenslaved by things that must Yield full soon to moth and rust,
Let her hold a light on high Men unborn may travel by.

Mightier still she then shall stand,
Moulded by Thy secret hand,
Power Eternal, at whose call Nations rise and nations fall!

WILLIAM WATSON.

WHATEVER may be said of us, and sometimes with too much justice, neither the greed of wealth, nor the love of luxury, nor the theories of the ancien régime, nor the extension of territory for the sake of commerce or national pride, are the things most dear to the people of England, or the things which in this great country move and direct her action in the end. That which is victorious at the last in her, that which sits closest to her breast, is the great powers of the soul of which Wordsworth speaks—self-sacrifice, duty to the great principles of justice and mercy; honour—the long descended honour of her free past; love and reverence for the souls of men, not for their outward power and wealth; the ancient principle of national independence and liberty for all nations, which of old isolated her from tyrannies, and bid her stand alone for their sake, relying for a just victory on their immortal power.

STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

BLESSED art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast given us the Law of truth, and hast planted everlasting life in our midst. Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine; thine, O Lord, is the kingdom, and the supremacy as head over all. Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at his footstool: holy is he. Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at his holy mount; for the Lord our God is holy. AMEN.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I very much regret like others of your correspondents that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have by their action brought this controversy upon us at the present moment. No doubt many like Mr. Montgomery do not see any live controversy in it at all. They see only the great practical convenience of the step which they have taken. I wonder if they have ever tried to understand the position of Dr. Martineau, or Dr. Beard, or Mr. Thom, or Dr. Sadler when they write as if this controversy were dead and as if those who very regretfully oppose their action were making a storm in a tea-cup.

Mr. Montgomery says: "The principle of the Open Trust is the principle of Religious Freedom....It is for the organised support of that principle that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association stands." That does not seem to me an accurate or satisfying description of the principles of the Association.

It does not stand for freedom to believe anything; it stands for certain definite doctrines and it is right in doing so. It has sought to have a positive faith. As Mr. Montgomery finely says: "We have secured freedom to believe, but we cannot live on that. We can only live on the believing." The Association is composed of men and women who have a religious belief which may be described as Unitarian or Liberal Christian. They wish and rightly wish to make that belief understood and to found or support churches where that belief will be expressed in the worship and preaching. In founding new churches they are entirely loyal to the principle of the Free Trust. Our group of Free Churches is in general agreement with the Association at the present time in their teaching. The difference between them is that the churches with a Free Trust are not bound to continue in this form of thought and belief, whereas the Unitarian Association by its name and purpose is so bound.

If, as Mr. Montgomery says, Unitarianism means essentially belief in a Free Trust, why would it be wrong, as the Association knows it would be wrong, to insert the name Unitarian into their Free Trusts? If it really means little or nothing more than "religious freedom," why should the name Unitarian be excluded from Free Trusts? We know, of course, very well that Unitarianism does not mean merely or mainly religious freedom. It means earnest religious convictions about God and the soul which commend themselves to us as true. There is a wide latitude of belief within the bounds of Unitarianism, but there are limits, necessary and right limits, to what can be called Unitarian.

I feel about this action of the Association in some way as if they were putting the name Unitarian into the Open Trusts of new churches. They are offering to place a permanent Unitarian Trustee upon the Trust; he will be, as Mr. Worthington has pointed out, a very important and dominating Trustee, sometimes the only Trustee. He cannot help, in spite of himself, limiting the freedom of that Trust. Any Trustee can do that for a time, but this pre-dominant Trustee will never die.

Any congregation which wishes the Association to become one of its Trustees will, of course, be Unitarian, and no doubt there will be practical advantages in having such a permanent Trustee, and in having its Trust administered by men of high character and capacity. But a Free Trust means that a church has the right to change its opinions. If any church in the future wants to change its opinions beyond the wide limits connoted by Unitarianism what is going to happen? The permanent Unitarian Trustee representing the Unitarian Association formed and supported to promote Unitarianism, cannot possibly sympathise, and would do his best to prevent such change. He will act as a hindrance to the development of the very principle which the Association has recognised by its own suggested Trust Deed to be right.

An Association which exists to do good work for the promotion of Unitarianism cannot manage or control churches which are by their Trust Deeds essentially free to hold and teach any form of belief in God they may choose. It can help churches with whose teaching it is in sympathy; it can establish congregations with a Free Trust which it hopes will remain Unitarian; it can promote in every way possible the principles of Unitarian Christianity. When, however, it assumes the right to be a permanent Trustee of such churches it is out of place and, without intending it, there is great danger of interfering with the freedom of growth which I am sure the members of its Committee at present respect as much as those of us who deplore their recent act.—Yours, &c.

HENRY GOW.

Hampstead,

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have read carefully all the interesting letters on this subject. The two causes of Unitarianism and religious liberty have happily in our own day become almost one, that is to say, that almost all Unitarians, were they presented with the choice between the two causes would see to it first that religious liberty was secured. But we must remember that though at present the causes are at one and seem likely to so remain, they are potentially divergent, and we must so exercise our imaginations as to see that they may never conflict. Hence, while I applaud the endowment of the Unitarian Association with coin and with power, I cannot forget that its objects as set forth at the beginning of its constitution are confined to the promotion of Unitarian interests. It therefore does not seem to me fitting to repose in a Unitarian corporation, which is subject to the duty of remaining permanently Unitarian, the task of administering on Open Trust designed to secure religious liberty, it may be even at the cost of Unitarianism itself. No one knows better than your own legal correspondents how important may become the duty of a trustee in the face of the issues gathered round the question of religious freedom. In the cases which have arisen, one historic, others obscure, I believe on the whole the causes of Unitarianism and religious freedom have been coincident, but this may not always be so, and we have no right to assume that it will be. I hope, therefore, that if the plan of a corporate trustee is to be pursued (and it has much to recommend it in the case of chapels relying on extraneous support) that a "non-party" corporation may be established, amenable within its trusts to the directions of the governing body of the chapel, and free by its constitution from allegiance to any dogma however lofty.—Yours, &c.,

R. H. ARMSTRONG.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—We are all equally anxious to maintain the great principle of the Open Trust, and it is because I believe that this object is greatly assisted by the power of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to act as Trustee that I support the action of the Association, taken at its Annual Meeting in 1914. The Association exists to uphold certain principles (not dogmas or theological beliefs) and the chief of these principles is that of the Open Trust. The Committee of the Association is elected not as an individual Trustee is, for life, but annually by the members of the Association, and thus is constantly kept in touch with and representative of the attitude of our churches. Perhaps the greatest danger that threatens an Open Trust from the side of the Trustees is that of an old Trustee who has changed his views or who fails to grasp the nature of the Trust he has to administer, and either acts in a manner prejudicial to the freedom of the congregation or declines to allow reasonable access to the Trust deeds. The appointment of such a living body as the Association, with custody of the deeds, would avoid this trouble. The question of voting at Trustees' meetings can easily be settled in the same manner as other transactions of a similar nature in which companies are concerned.

There remain two possible objections. The first is the alleged difficulty of removing the Association should any particular congregation become out of sympathy with liberal theology. The record of the Association is the best answer. There is every reason to believe that if the change were the result of genuine development and not an illegal attempt to capture a building, the Association, true to its principles, would retire from the Trust. The second suggested difficulty would arise should our churches generally at some future time develop a form of Theology to which the term "Unitarian" with all its elasticity and width could not be applied. In such an event, utterly remote at present, the Association could change its name.—Yours, &c., ATHELSTANE A. TAYLER.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I thank you for the space you have given to the discussion of which I was the originator under stress of a call of duty that to me was absolutely imperative. I just delivered my soul, and after reading the replies with the respect they deserve I have not a word to unsay of the deliverance. I rather thank God that I gave occasion for the splendid vindication of my action in the masterly letter of Mr. Worthington. To have called forth that weighty utterance is to have placed on record a statement of the completest kind of the unanswerable objections to the step of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association which I assailed. I will not with a single word of my own weaken the force of an argument in which a lawyer intimately versed in the subject with which he dealt replied to his peers. In reference to their letters and Mr. Tarrant's, I pay my tribute to the friendly spirit breathing in them warmly reciprocated by me. Mr. Montgomery's and Mr. Tarrant's contributions were, from their point of view, admirable specimens of the way to conduct controversy. I found in my old friend, Mr. Sharpe's, rather a series of conundrums than a serious treatment of the subject, and, as is my wont with riddles, gave them up. I can, however, assure him, without a particle of doubt, that I have not the smallest conscientious objection to receiving his valued subscription to M.C.O., and if the Archbishop of Canterbury would add his name to the list it would be equally welcome. I may add that the last time I was asked by our retiring students to give the welcome to the ministry, one to whom I gave the right hand of fellowship with peculiar satisfaction was entering the service of the Archbishop's church. That was a remarkable outcome of what Mr. Sharpe calls our dogmatic teaching. I have sincerely welcomed the tone of mutual regard that has made our controversy rather a cementing than a breach of friendship; while I conclude with repeating my insistent plea that our congregations should carefully consider, under the added light of Mr. Worthington's convincing letter, the issues involved, before they invite to their chapel trusteeships the B. and F.U.A. In my earlier campaign, under great leaders, against the Unitarian Hall that we scotched, the cry was "Hands off our trusts." In this it is "Hands off our trustees." In both cases equally to lay hands on them is, to me, to lay them on the very Ark of the Covenant. I shall oppose it to my latest breath. It is in my very bones, and I can do no other.—Yours, &c.

YOUNG PEOPLE AND THE CHURCH.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to make known through your columns that, through a suggestion of mine at the recent meetings of the National Conference, it has been arranged to hold a class in London during the Christmas holidays for boys and girls from fifteen to eighteen years of age, to instruct them in the essentials of our faith, and to prepare them for a Confirmation or Dedication Service at the close of the course, which would be continued in the Easter holidays. Participation in the service would, however, be optional. A nucleus has been secured, and the Rev. Henry Gow has most kindly consented to conduct the class, which will meet in the early part of the day in some central place. I should be glad to hear as soon as possible from parents of young people likely to join, or wishing further particulars, and I trust that all will feel with me the urgent importance of placing before our own girls and boys those truths and ideals for which we stand, and waking their reverence for them. I would welcome all, but have especially in mind those who, being away at school most of the year, possibly under orthodox influences, often do not enjoy the advantages of the Sunday School scholar.—Yours, &c.,

PROVINCIAL MEETINGS OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE Provincial Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which were held at Mexborough and Bolton-on-Dearne, Nov. 24-25, opened with a Conference of Ministers, of the Ministerial Fellowship, at Channing Hall, Sheffield, at 11.30 on Wednesday, when the delegates were welcomed by the members of the Sheffield Unitarian Association.
 In the afternoon a reception was held at the Free Christian Church, Mexborough, when the representatives of the Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, District Societies and the Women's League were welcomed by Councillor W. Winstanley, J.P., Chairman of the Urban District Council, who presided. Mr. Winstanley was supported on the platform by Mrs. J. C. Drummond, of London (of the Central Committee, Women's League); Miss Clephan, of Leicester (Sunday School Association);
 Rev. Dr. Charles Hargrove, (ex-President); Dr. L. Ram (President of the Mexborough Free Christian Church); and the Rev. T. Anderson (pastor of the Mexborough Free Christian Church).

Among others present were: Mr.
 Howard Chatfield Clarke (Treasurer of the Association), Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. Ion Pritchard, and the Revs. W. C. Bowie, T. P. Spedding,
 J. C. Ballantyne, A. Hall, Lloyd Jones,
 Dr. Mellone, Missionary College; J. C.
 Flower, C. J. Street, A. H. Dolphin, and J. W. Lee (Sheffield).

Mr. Winstanley, in welcoming the delegates, said that three or four weeks ago he had the privilege of welcoming to Mexborough troops who represented the atmosphere of the moment—a martial atmosphere, the atmosphere which hung like a ghastly pall over Europe. That day he had the privilege of welcoming something of an entirely different kind; an atmosphere which he hoped would renew faith and hope in stricken hearts.
 If they could bring a message of comfort to those whose hearts had been bowed down by the horror and anguish of the war, their visit would indeed have been most welcome and happy. He welcomed them personally because they were a band of people who sought after the Truth in its essence. The work upon which they were engaged would be needed more than ever when the war was over, for he believed there would be a great awakening of heart and mind, and they would need more and more vigorous guidance from their ministers and spiritual leaders. When that time came they would have to drop a great many shibboleths and wordy doctrines and dogmas, in order that they might speak more directly to the hearts of the people.

Dr. Hargrove, responding to the welcome accorded them by one who, as Chairman of the Mexborough Urban District Council, stood for the material welfare of the place, and all that went to make the town decent and habitable, said it was a practice of Unitarians to take a direct and personal interest in such matters, and wherever Unitarian ministers were found they were generally acting in close co-operation with the local authority. He thanked them cordially for their welcome and the inhabitants of Mexborough for their goodwill.

Mr. E. Bramley (President of the Sheffield Unitarian Association) extended a welcome to the delegates on behalf of that Association.

Dr. L. Ram, president of the committee of the Mexborough Free Christian Church, said it was a source of gratification that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had accepted their invitation so readily, and it showed that that Association did not forget the humblest of its members.

The Rev. T. Anderson said he would like to congratulate the Chairman on the fact of his filling that position. Mr.
 Winstanley had several times preached from their pulpit, and he had kindly promised, in the near future, to give an address to the Sunday School teachers of the Association. He (Mr. Anderson) represented in his welcome the whole of the church in Mexborough. He could say that the Mexborough Free Christian Church was, at any rate, alive. There were, some months ago, prophets in their midst who thought that their movement would soon have its day, and cease to be. They were having their day, and had not ceased to be. They were stronger to-day than they were twelve months ago, and they hoped to be stronger still.

Miss Clephan, of Leicester, and Mrs. J. C. Drummond, of London, briefly acknowledged, on behalf of their respective organisations, the Sunday School Association and the Women's League.

At the afternoon conference, over which Mr. W. E. Taylor (Doncaster) presided, an address was delivered by Dr. Hargrove on 'Sacrifices which Truth Demands.' A discussion followed, which was opened by the Rev. J. Cyril Flower, of Bolton.

In the evening a religious service, which was well attended, was conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, the preacher being the Rev. Dr. Mellone (Principal of the Unitarian College, Manchester). Dr. Mellone took for his text: 'Have I been so long time with you, and hast thou not known me?' There was, he said, an ancient legend that told of a city overwhelmed and cast down into the depths of the sea, and as the waves rolled to and fro, far above its topmost towers, sometimes a current would find its way down to the deep and ring the city's bells. Sometimes during the storm and turmoil on the surface there was heard the muffled ringing of the bells. Even so, buried in this human life that we shared with the red world around us, there was the City of God, that City whose Temple they were; and amid all the discord and clash of strife, and agony of doubt and pain, and dismay, they could still hear the low, penetrating music of the bells—the buried bells of the City of God. He would say to those who were consecrated to the ministry, "Be not afraid." Some of them in their heart of hearts were afraid. The Powers of Evil had struck terror into the hearts of many religious men; they were bewildered and dumb before it. But if ever their ministry was worth anything in the sight of God and man, to-day it was worth far more than ever it was. The world had grown tired of theology as represented by intellectual definitions, but an honest man's experience had the same value as ever it had.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

On Thursday morning the members visited the Free Christian Church at Bolton-upon-Deerne, where, after a devotional service, several conferences took place. The first of these was presided over by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, and the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A., gave an address on 'What is the Gospel of the Unitarian Christian?' The Rev. J. W. Lee (Sheffield), opened the discussion. The Rev. J. C. Ballantyne then read a paper on 'The Smaller Church and the Larger Fellowship,' and the discussion over which Mr. Lloyd Jones, of Liverpool, presided, was opened by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

The party then returned to Mexboro', and after lunch a conference was held in the Free Christian Church, organised by the Sunday School Association. The Rev. Bertram Lister spoke on 'The Religious Education of our Young People,' the Rev. T. P. Spedding on 'The Sunday School and the Child,' and the Rev. Dr. Ratray on 'The Church and the Young People.' Mr. Ion Prichard gave an address on 'Claims of Citizenship upon our Young People.' Miss Clephan also spoke. There was a further conference of the Women's League, addressed by Mrs. J. C. Drummond and Miss Johnson, of Bury, and presided over by Mrs. Laycock, of Sheffield. In the evening a public meeting was held, presided over by Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke.

The principal speaker of the evening was Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., whose subject was 'The Abiding Things of Religion in a World Conflict.' Were there any? he asked. What would emerge from the war they could not tell; but they did know that society could not emerge in the same condition as when it entered into the conflict. Millions of men had been killed and maimed, and the future generations would be the poorer for the lowering of the standard of parentage, for the lowering of national faith and of human conduct. In Armenia a whole nation was being slowly murdered. They might ask themselves was there any room for religion in a world such as that? Was there any wonder that man's faith was shaken and that he asked the question, "Does God know?" Yet God had given to man the choice between evil and good. This war, with all its horrors, differed in only the slightest degree from evils which before had shaken the world without shaking the faith of the world in God. In spite of the war, God abides, and, if so, religion must abide with all its comfort and joy and duty and obligation. Never was religion more real than it was to-day. A Member of Parliament (Mr. Page Croft), who had been in the trenches ten months, said in the House of Commons the other day that he saw there, in the midst of the fighting, more real religion than he had seen in all his life before.

Mr. Chancellor was followed by Miss Clephan, of Leicester, Dr. Hargrove, the Rev. Alfred Hall, and the Rev. C. J. Street. Hearty votes of thanks and many expressions of goodwill on the part of the visitors and their hosts brought the proceedings, and the visit of the Association, to a close.

IMPRESSIONS BY A DELEGATE.

Some delegates had hardly heard of Mexborough before. Was it wise for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to go there? Were the meetings at all likely to be successful? Well, now we have been there, a very different answer will be given from what some apparently had expected. At the reception in the afternoon the Civic Welcome, if we may so term it, was given by Mr. Councillor W. Winstanley, the Chairman of the District Council. He was not a Unitarian, but gave us a hearty welcome in the name of the town which, he said, had a reputation for smoke and dirt, but underneath them would be found, as we indeed all found, real Yorkshire hearts. Dr. Hargrove responded to this and expressed our desire to live on the best of terms with all religious bodies. Then we were again welcomed by Mr. E. Bramley, Chairman of the Sheffield and District Association of Churches, by Dr. Ram of the Mexborough congregation, and by the Rev. T. Anderson, its minister. Dr. Ram said he was expecting a good entertainment in the religious sphere from the meetings. It was delightful and encouraging to hear Mr. Anderson tell that the congregation was a stronger body to-day than twelve months ago, that they were all pretty well on a level socially, the aristocrats among them helping to clean the windows. Miss Clephan (of Leicester), President of the Sunday School Association, and Mrs. J. C. Drummond (of London) on behalf of the Women's League, also responded to the welcome. Mr. W. E. Taylor, of Doncaster, presided at the first meeting. Dr. Hargrove led us as we meditated upon "The Sacrifices demanded by Truth." We were reminded that questions thrust themselves upon the attention of men and women to-day, and various motives were put forth and considered as to our attitude towards these questions and problems. Loyalty to truth and freedom to express it openly were put forward as characteristics of our own religious community. We had an interesting discussion opened by the Rev. Cyril Flower, of Bolton, and taken part in, among others, by the Rev. Percy Jones, of Doncaster, who said that in his opinion a great many churches want emptying before you can fill them, that more heat was required among us if ever we were to succeed as we wished to do.

Then followed the service conducted by the Rev. T. P. Spedding, and the sermon preached by Dr. Mellone, the Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Manchester. It was well attended and a hearty service.

On Thursday morning we journeyed to Bolton-on-Deerne, a child of Mexborough and a vigorous and healthy child. After a short devotional service conducted by the Rev. C. Flower, we listened to two excellent papers, one on 'What is the Gospel of the Unitarian Church?' by the Rev. Alfred Hall of Newcastle-on-Tyne, and the other on 'The Small Church and the Larger Fellowship,' by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne of Nottingham. It was good to see and hear our old friend, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, in the chair. Mr. Hall spoke admirably and in a helpful way of various points of our Unitarian Gospel, the dignity and divinity of man, the solidarity of the race, and the progressiveness of life, a real grip of which, he said, would give hope and power and inspiration which were also much needed to-day. Mr. Ballantyne was bright and breezy as usual. A very helpful distinction was drawn between the more or less permanently and necessarily small church which, perhaps, we have inherited from the past, and the newer small church unable to provide for itself in a financial way. The drift of Mr. Ballantyne's remarks was in the direction that the Local Associations should look after these small churches, and wherever possible bind them on in fellowship with bigger ones. It was decided to make inquiries concerning the history of our local associations from this point of view. We shall probably hear of the matter again next Whitsuntide.

Helpful and useful meetings of the Sunday School Association and the Women's League followed. Mr. Ion Pritchard fulfilled his usual rôle in recommending the books of the Association, and Miss Clephan, the Rev. B. Lister, and the Rev. Dr. Rattray had some good suggestions to make about various parts of our Sunday School work. Mr. Lister, in dealing with the problem from the point of view of the child and the Sunday School, spoke of the remarks not infrequently heard to-day that the Sunday School had had its day. In answer to that he suggested that it was not the Sunday School but its antiquated methods that needed changing. At the Women's League meeting Mrs. Drummond, of London, and Miss Johnstone, of Bury, were the chief speakers, and after that followed the public meeting dealing with the "Abiding Things of Religion in a World Conflict." The speakers were Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Miss Clephan, the Rev. Alfred Hall, Dr. Chas. Hargrove, and the Rev. C. J. Street.

Surveying the meetings as a whole our verdict must be that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was abundantly justified in holding them. We hope that the movement at Mexborough and elsewhere will have received a great impetus towards realising some of its great ideals.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Blackpool, North Shore.—The Rev. J. Horace Short has been granted permission by his congregation to join the R.A.M.C. He has volunteered for general service and will take the first call which comes through the St. John's Ambulance Association on or after January 1st.

Bootle.—On Sunday evening the Rev. Walter Short, who has been accepted to train for a commission in the army, and is already at work, preached a farewell sermon to a congregation which almost filled the seats. Speaking of his feelings while on holiday when the war broke out and seeing the Territorials called away from their farms and gardens, he said that at that time he had not felt called on to fight, but later on, when Sir John French's first despatch was published, and when officers were falling in large numbers, he decided to apply for a commission. Later on, he repeated his application, but nothing came of it. After academic, newspaper discussions of the causes of and remedies for the state of war, and after the unchivalrous actions of our foes, such as Scarborough, the Lusitania, &c., it was clear that we are fighting to preserve civilisation and right against might. The choice lay between remaining at home and labouring to maintain spirituality, worship, education, and philanthropy, or joining the army. Friends said he was doing good work at home, but when he saw men of every rank in life enlisting he felt that Unitarian ministers were not exempt. As a preacher of righteousness, of sacrifice, and of brotherhood, he felt called upon to exemplify these things in action. After a brief word on the happy relations between himself and the church, he said he was going to do work of a temporary character. The congregation remain to do permanent work in maintaining public religion and virtue. He besought them to uphold their church as part of their patriotic duty. After the benediction the congregation responded by singing the hymn 'God be with you till we meet again,' and affectionate farewells were spoken as they passed out.

Deptford.—Our advertising columns explain the need there has been for the repairs at Deptford. These repairs have required the building of many piers to the walls, cutting out and replacing defective brickwork, rearranging windows, putting in new window frames, providing a new drainage system and new boundary walls, plastering the inside of the chapel instead of renewing the matchboarding, and removing the last of the old pews. It will be possible to use half of the chapel for institutional purposes by adopting a system of curtains. Renewed activities began at Deptford during the three years in which the Rev. W. W. C. Pope was in charge. Three years ago Mr. Carlier was appointed minister and in his care the work has developed. Mr. Ronald P. Jones made plans for an extension of premises but there were difficulties in the way. Internal repairs were necessary; these were begun but were found insufficient. Now the extensive scheme of repairs has been almost completed. A reopening service was held on Saturday, November 27th, when the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, who had been associated with the congregation in his early days, was the preacher. The subsequent Public Meeting, under the presidency of Dr. C. Herbert-Smith, was enthusiastic. Dr. Herbert-Smith congratulated the members on the alterations that had been carried out. Mr. F. C. Creak said that £370 were still required and the Rev. J. A. Pearson read letters of goodwill. The Rev. Alexander Gordon gave some delightful personal reminiscences of his early preaching days when he sometimes supplied at General Baptist Chapels, and described the variety of religious teaching to be found in London sixty years ago—Arian at Worship Street; Priestleyan at Stoke Newington; Channing type at Rosslyn Hill; and the "new views" at Little Portland Street. He pointed out that conviction was always superior to uniformity. Mr. Carlier, minister, and Mr. Pain, a trustee, expressed their thanks to the District Society for getting the ancient building put into repair; the Rev. J. H. Weatherall told of the time when he was secretary of the Band of Hope at Deptford; the Rev. F. Summers brought words of cheer; Mr. Athelstane Taylor, chairman of the L.D.U.S. Executive, spoke of the warm interest of the Society in the work; the Rev. T. P. Spedding, with one of his Rochdale boys in khaki accompanying him, spoke encouragingly to the young folks present; and the Rev. J. A. Pearson showed why he thought it worth while, especially at the present time, to keep open every centre of religious influence. The meeting was hearty and hopeful, and there is reason to expect that Deptford Old Chapel will find its sphere of usefulness enlarged, especially if the remaining charges for these most necessary repairs can be met without delay. An earnest appeal is made to our readers to help.

Glossop.—The Rev. Joseph Wilson recently offered himself for military service but has failed to pass the usual medical tests. Mr. Wilson is to be heartily congratulated upon his public-spirited action.

Ilford.—A Fellowship meeting of the local branch of the Women's League was held in the Unitarian Church on Tuesday afternoon. A devotional service was conducted by Miss Hargrove (member of the Executive Committee). At the subsequent meeting Miss Grace Mitchell (Hon. Fellowship Secretary) spoke on 'Fellowship: How It Began,' with special reference to the Overseas Dominions. Mrs. Reginald Wight (Home Fellowship Secretary) gave an interesting description of the way in which the League works for the home churches, mentioning the efforts made to keep in touch with people removing from one district to another. Miss Hargrove spoke upon the value of co-operation in church work, urging that the London churches should get more into contact with one another for purposes which were common to them all. A conference followed in which several members and the Rev. A. H. Biggs took part. The attendance numbered between thirty and forty.

London, Brixton.—On Tuesday, November 30th, an "At Home" was given by the Girls' Own Brigade, when the parents of the girls and the members of the church were present. There was a display of drilling and dancing and the needlework for the G.O.B. stall at the forthcoming Sale of Work was on show. Mrs. Sydney Martineau, the President, spoke most encouraging words to the girls, bidding them work steadily on, in spite of the fact that they were to lose their beloved Captain. On behalf of the officers and privates, one of the girls who had never missed church, Sunday School, or Brigade during the year presented the Captain, Mrs. G. M. Elliott, with a bracelet, as a token of their love and an expression of their sorrow at her leaving Brixton.

London Lay Preachers' Union.—Mr. S. D. Greenfield, the Hon. Secretary, has enlisted in the R.A.M.C. During his absence his duties will be performed by the President, Mr. John Kinsan, 4, Winchester Road, Ilford. Mr. Greenfield, who has been very zealous in the work of lay-preaching, takes with him the congratulation and good wishes of many friends. Mr. F. W. Ross, another well-known member of the Union, has also joined the R.A.M.C.

Merthyr Tydvil.—We regret to announce that the Rev. Nestor Rayson Williams, over thirty years minister (Unitarian), 1860-94, at Merthyr Tydvil, died on November 29th, at his old house, Merryvale, Pem., aged 81.

Victoria, B.C.—On Friday, October 22nd, the ladies of the Women's Alliance of the Victoria Unitarian Church gave a farewell supper in honour of Mr. and Mrs. H. E. B. Speight. About fifty guests were present. It was a great disappointment that Mr. Speight had to be absent owing to a severe attack of influenza. Mrs. Speight, however, ably took his place. Several prominent members of the congregation voiced their love and admiration for Mr. Speight, their regrets at his imminent departure were tempered by the hope that the parting would prove to have been but a loan to Berkeley. Mr. Stevenson, minister of the Emmanuel Baptist Church, wished God-speed to a valued colleague and congratulated the church on having been the means of bringing Mr. Speight from the old country to wider fields. The President of the Women's Christian Temperance Union spoke of Mr. Speight's growing popularity in the city of Victoria and of her conviction that he would return to Canada. The President of the church then presented Mrs. Speight with a set of typical Canadian authors, saying that these books must keep the memory of Canada fresh in their memories and some day bring them back. Mrs. Speight said that her husband was very sorry not to be there that night; in words which gave vivid expression to the emotion they were meant to hide, she spoke of their love for their little church and of the happiness that this year in Victoria had brought them. On the following Sunday, October 24th, Mr. Speight, assisted by his wife (who read the lessons), concluded his work in this church.

Walsall.—On Sunday last the Chapel Anniversary Services were held, the preacher being the Rev. Dr. Ewart of Stourbridge. On the following evening the Anniversary Meeting and Social took place. Helpful addresses were delivered by the Revs. H. C. Hawkins of Oldbury, W. G. Topping of Caseley, and others. Much regret was expressed at the absence of the Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman through illness.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE VALUE OF THE POTATO PATCH.

Mr. Walford Martin, who read a paper at a conference of the Vegetarian Society held in Manchester a few weeks ago on "Food, Wages, and Economy; To-day and To-morrow," gave some interesting facts about the nutritive qualities of certain articles of diet, and alluded to the potato, which appears to be sadly under-estimated, as the staff of life. A man, he said, who on a small patch of land had enough potatoes to feed his children through the winter could meet the uncertainties of life and employment with comparative calm. In spite of all present difficulties, he went on, in connection with the possession of land in England, considering its superiority as an investment, the purchase of agricultural land at £40 an acre, freehold, still remained one of the cheapest properties available. For the price of a bicycle one might buy a quarter of an acre of land, enough to provide a man with food for ever—a useful bit of ammunition for public lecturers on "back to the land" and the genuinely simple life.

BOOKER WASHINGTON'S ANCESTRY.

Sir Harry Johnson in an article in The Times the day after his death was announced gives the story of Booker Washington's life in outline, and as a record of achievements attained in spite of almost insuperable difficulties which would have daunted a man with less tenacity of purpose and genuine idealism, it is surely hard to beat. When he set out in 1872 on his pilgrimage of 500 miles to the famous Hampton Institute which had been founded by General Samuel Armstrong and the American Missionary Association, he only had a sum amounting to perhaps 10s. or 12s. in his pocket, and he was quite penniless and literally starving when he reached Richmond, the capital of Virginia, nearly 100 miles from his destination; yet he ended his life the head of a mighty centre of learning and industry in which many thousands of coloured men and women have been prepared to earn an honourable livelihood, and which had made his name famous all over the world. Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who gave the Tuskegee Institute its magnificent library, and endowed it so liberally that it need never fear lack of funds for the carrying on of its work, called him the Moses of the negro race. It is a curious thing, by the way, that when Professor Keith was shown a portrait of him, he said, "This is the head of an Italian, not of a negro," and Sir Harry Johnson has an interesting theory that he had Crusader's blood in his veins. His second name, Taliaferro, is supposed to have been the name of his father, a white man or octoroon (his mother was a negress and a slave), and Tagliaferro ("cuts through iron"), Taillefer, Telfer was a common name among the Crusaders and condottieri of North Italy, Provence, and Normandy, and Norman England. Several Italian adventurers bearing this name came to the United States either at the close of the eighteenth century or after the Napoleonic wars, and one of them or of their descendants may have been the father of Booker Washington.

DEPTFORD GENERAL BAPTIST (UNITARIAN) CHAPEL.

SECOND APPEAL.

THIS ancient chapel being very dilapidated, our architect advised us early in 1914 to do certain repairs. £150 were raised and the work put in hand. While it was in progress the L.C.C. Surveyor intervened and condemned the building as structurally unsafe. We then obtained estimates for the work which he required to be done, and issued an appeal for £700. To this we have received a generous response of £620.

Unfortunately during the work of reconstruction other defects revealed themselves, and new requirements were made by the Surveyor, as a consequence of which we need an additional £400.

This statement will show that from what was a modest undertaking financed before the building was touched, we have been led on to a very considerable expenditure, almost in spite of ourselves. Happily, the reconstruction is now practically completed, and we know the full extent of our liability. It would have been a disaster to the Congregation to lose their chapel. They are an active body of people, and under Mr. Carlier's capable leadership there is good reason to believe that the church will meet with increasing effectiveness the needs of a thickly populated and not very cheerful neighbourhood.

We should like to draw attention to the activities which were being carried on when minister and people were startled by the news that there was danger of their chapel tumbling about their ears and must be closed:—

Sunday Services: Evening Attendances, 60 to 80.

Sunday School: 150 Children and 14 Teachers.

Monday: Mothers' Meeting; Winter Concerts.

Tuesday: Band of Hope and Boy Scouts.

Wednesday: Girls' Sewing Classes and Women's League.

Thursday: Women's Devotional Hour, Girls' Club, Choir Practice.

Friday: Boys' and Young Men's Clubs.

The Suggestion contained in this statement is a fair indication of the spirit and the possibilities of the movement. To this, it may be added, that poor as they are—and Deptford is one of the poorest districts in London—the members of the congregation are raising £50 themselves. We earnestly appeal to you to help us, and we make the appeal the more urgently on the very ground that it is so difficult to raise money just now.

Donations will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Treasurer to the Deptford Fund, Mr. F. C. CREAK, Fernwood, North Hill Highgate, N., or by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, 4, Ella Road, Crouch Hill, N. Mr. Pearson has had special opportunities of seeing the good work carried on by Mr. Carlier, and of assisting him in various ways.

C. HERBERT-SMITH, President of the London District Unitarian Society.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

EVERY week it becomes clearer that the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund has gripped the imagination of the churches. Its appeal has turned many of them into hives of industry, and they have found here just the work which they needed to give concreteness and personal interest to their efforts. The effect upon religious life will be healthy and far-reaching. Charity, not the study of problems, is the way of salvation. We meet all our own difficulties not only with greater cheerfulness but also with clearer spiritual insight, if we have spent our own strength and substance in the service of others and given a large place in our lives to the universal claims of suffering.

MORE and more this work has become our work, work in which we are all partners. Those of us who are closely connected with the administration of the Fund know what quiet and beautiful sacrifice is hidden away in the bald details of our subscription list. People have gone without things which they need or they have parted with treasured possessions in order to give. Half-pennies from little children and the widow's mite, they are all there in company with the larger gifts, and week by week they are turned into articles of practical use which, in present circumstances, are all the more effective as symbols of friendship because they are useful. Those who support the Fund with their money or their work are sending a constant stream of friendship into the hospitals. Something of themselves is given away to these suffering men whom they have never seen, and the men themselves, our friends and comrades, feel it and understand.

In this way the small group of us who know all the details of the work, are simply the means of communication for the charity and loving-kindness of many hearts. We feel it to be a position of great privilege. We wish that many others could share the experience with us, the personal contact with grim realities, the helpful intercourse with doctors and patients in the hospitals, the spirit of adventure which gives a new zest to living in these days of strife, the comfort of doing something on the spot. But since this cannot be we can only pass on in rich measure; pressed down and running over, the gratitude which has come to us in such abundance. This is a spiritual treasure in which we are all partners, whether we give our money, or spend our time in sewing, or visit the hospitals in France.

WHEN the newspapers begin to publish their own private interviews with the King of Greece we may be allowed to indulge in a little wholesome scepticism. We do not mean that the conversations are simply invented; but they are probably written up and represent personal impressions rather than literal reporting. It is almost incredible that King Constantine should choose the interviewer as the best and most dignified means of announcing his opinions to the world at a time when he is engaged in most difficult negotiations with the Allies. There is no reason to doubt the warmth of his personal feelings towards England, a sentiment most suitable for The Times, or his attachment to neutrality, a point of sympathetic contact with American readers; but these two interviews of which so much has been made in the Press, cannot be accepted as throwing any fresh light upon the situation. They belong to the personalia of clever journalism and are entirely without political significance.

AMERICAN opinion has been deeply stirred by the damning evidence of unscrupulous German intrigue. The verdict of guilty in the recent trial has been followed by a scathing denunciation of plotters in President Wilson's message to Congress.

There are [he said] citizens of the United States, I blush to admit, born under other flags, but welcomed under our generous naturalisation laws to full freedom of opportunity in America, who have poured poison and disloyalty into the very arteries of our national life, and who have sought to bring the authority and good name of our Government into contempt, to destroy our industries wherever they thought it effective for their vindictive purposes, to strike at them and debase our policies to the uses of foreign intrigue. Their number is not great as compared with the whole number of those sturdy hosts by which our nation has been enriched in recent generations out of virile foreign stocks, but it is great enough to have brought deep disgrace upon us and to have made it necessary that we should promptly make use of the processes of law whereby they may be purged of their corrupt distempers. America has never witnessed anything like this before.... But the ugly and incredible thing actually has come about, and we are without adequate Federal laws to deal with it. I urge you to enact such laws at the earliest possible moment, and I feel that in doing so I am urging you to do nothing less than to save the honour and self-respect of the nation. Such creatures of passion, disloyalty, and anarchy must be crushed out.

In spite of these fine passages, which ring with sincere indignation, there was a good deal of nationalism of the narrower type running through President Wilson's message. He proclaimed his unabated attachment to the Monroe doctrine. His ideal seems to be that of America for Americans, and policy both in the commercial and the military sphere is to be dictated by the need of developing in the American hemisphere an independence and self-sufficiency which will keep it apart from the tangle of European affairs. For this purpose an adequate defensive force is to be organised and the mercantile marine to be rapidly developed with the help of public money. According to this view America is a closed preserve. Its business is to make "common cause with all partisans of liberty on this side of the sea," and not to meddle with the affairs of Europe however disturbing or threatening they may be.

WE know that this ideal makes a strong appeal to some American thinkers and that it is a good popular cry for an election campaign. But from the political point of view it is terribly short-sighted. President Wilson's mind seems still to be obsessed by traditional phrases about the new and the old world, which have ceased to correspond to any reality. They came into existence at a time when news travelled slowly and the means of communication were difficult. The ocean liner and the constant stream of immigration have linked the life of America and that of Europe in bonds which cannot be broken. No legal enactments can banish the base intrigues which arouse President Wilson's righteous indignation, and no doctrine of America for the Americans can make her independent either of English thought or of plots made in Germany. The problem is not one of boundaries but of morals. The defeat of liberty in Europe and the success of a government which employs "creatures of passion, disloyalty and anarchy" would mean irretrievable disaster to America. We do not plead that she ought to come in and fight on our side; but this battle for liberty in Europe is her battle too, and on grounds of national interest alone recent events point to the wisdom of an open avowal of her moral solidarity with the Allies.

THE intermittent reports that Germany desires peace leave us quite unmoved, and that for two reasons. There is no evidence that in the main they are not part of her tainted press campaign, feelers deliberately organised in order to utilise any weariness of the war, which may exist here and there in small groups among the Allies, for her own ends. But our chief reason is that peace now would be an act of cowardice and dishonour. A mere cessation of hostilities at the present moment, with Germany left boasting that her methods of barbarism and treachery have succeeded, would only prepare the way for worse misery for the world in a few years. We did not enter upon this war in order to gain territory or satisfy national sentiment. We were so little prepared for it that we are now only just ready to put forth all our strength. Slowly and with stern resolve we have gathered ourselves together to drive back the invader and to punish the rebellious spirit which has risen up to destroy our civilisation. In such a contest of principles there can be for us no drawn battles and no easy terms of peace, for we love peace too well to accept its pale counterfeit and leave the world in bondage.

LORD DERBY'S recruiting campaign closes this week. Fortunately the specious pleas for a further extension of time have been without effect. The reports of increased activity which have come in from all over the country show that many men refuse to make up their minds until it is nearly too late. Unfortunately there is still a good deal of uneasiness about the number of young unmarried men who have failed to come forward. It is disquieting from the point of view not only of military efficiency but also of our future citizenship. If the grounds of refusal were analysed they would probably reveal a great deal of confusion of mind and not a little failure to realise the terrible nature of the crisis through which we are passing. Most of the excuses offered are quite unworthy of one of the supreme moments in the history of the world, and perhaps it is most charitable to put them down to feebleness of imagination and the habit of living in narrow grooves. Further comment is useless until the figures are made known. We still cling to the hope that they will enable us to fulfil our obligations without resort to compulsion.

THE question of exemptions is occupying a good deal of attention, and we hope that the authorities will deal wisely with it, not on professional but on public grounds. It is undoubtedly right for men to avoid deciding the importance of their civil occupation for themselves. When they are enrolled in their proper group, the work of sifting and supervision can begin. A very good case can be made out for not taking too many medical students or school teachers to serve in the army, and it would be a good thing to send many of them back in the interest of health and education. For this there is a genuine demand which ought not to be disregarded. If ministers of religion enlisted in anything like the same proportion they might well be subject to similar enlightened consideration. At present there is very little public concern about them at all and no apprehension that churches will be understaffed. For one thing so few of them have gone. But there is also, we fear, a widespread expectation that they will be more aloof and professional than other men, a fact which we find terribly disquieting.

ARTIFEX writes this week in the Manchester Guardian to point out that the spiritual revival, which many people expected and almost demanded as a consequence of the sharp discipline of the war, has not come. Churches are still thinly attended and men's minds are no more occupied with the work of organised religion than they were before. May we venture upon a word of caution. The upheaval of our national life cannot be expected to work a reformation in character and a change of heart in the course of a few months, especially as we have borne hitherto so little of the poverty and loneliness and pain. It is afterwards that many of us will feel the hand of God heavy upon us and will perhaps begin to remember. Let us also avoid the mistake of thinking that there is no deep stirring of men's hearts because it does not instantly send them flocking to the churches. Perhaps the churches themselves need conversion as well as the multitude. A short time ago the present writer wandered into one of our English Cathedrals. It was quite deserted. Everything about it had an air of stiff propriety, and the doors which led into all the forbidden places of beauty and prayer were carefully locked. It seemed to have no meaning for wayward tempest-tossed men except as a sepulchre for their emotions. It was easier to find the exaltation of duty and the healing touch of sympathy outside. These things are a parable.

TO SUSTAIN THE SPIRIT OF THE NATION.

It is the soul of goodness that we need to keep alive in this terrible struggle for freedom and righteousness. For this reason we wish to commend to the attention and support of our readers the "Fight for Right" Movement, whose animating spirit is described in an article by Mr. Boutwood in our present issue. Its object is not to argue or dispute, but to keep the community faithful to the moral decision to which it is already committed. We use the word community advisedly because it is an inclusive term. The country has made up its mind that for us this is a righteous war. In August, 1914 it meant a sharp decision of conscience on a definite issue. We could not betray Belgium without guilt or abandon France without dishonour. Now the more local conflict has widened into a world-war between rival principles of civilisation, and every step which unscrupulous force has taken to compass its ends has only confirmed us in the rightness of our first decision. We were acting then not only more wisely but also more rightly than we knew.

Nothing has been more impressive in our national life during the past year than our moral solidarity. Never before have we seen all the instincts of nobleness converge with such sureness of aim upon the same path of hard and dangerous duty. The voices of dissent have been few and feeble, for there has been nothing to say. No passionate challenge has been uttered, no kindling spiritual appeal has been made on behalf of absention or non-resistance, simply because men cannot use the weapons of moral imagination against the clear verdict of the awakened conscience. The truth is that in this war there are no spectators, and so far as our own country is concerned there are no neutrals. We are all in it. The man who is not putting his energy into winning a victory for England, and for those basal principles of justice and honour for which England stands, is helping to give the victory to Germany and the spirit which ravaged Belgium, or to produce a fatal balance of disillusionment and exhaustion which would mean moral chaos and the reign of brute force for several generations. It is because we realise this so deeply that we have achieved a moral union unprecedented in our history.

But we must guard the sacred flame. The spirit of self-devotion with which we entered this war may easily be weakened by the temptations and dangers to which it is exposed. War itself, in its physical aspects, apart from a clear vision of its ideal ends, is a brutalising thing. We grow weary with long delays, or bitter under the strain of suffering. It is hard to keep a temper of composed strength and unshaken loyalty to the highest. The evil spirits of hatred and vengeance lie in wait for our souls. To yield to those baser courses of feeling and action is to betray our cause, or at least, to show ourselves unworthy of serving it. We must stand together as one brotherhood of the faithful, engaged in a noble rivalry of endeavour to rise to the full height of self-devotion which is required of us, never letting a day pass without its reminder that a good cause needs good men to fight for it. It is this need of co-operative effort to sustain the spirit of the Nation which has led Sir Francis Younghusband and the band of able men who are associated with him to found the "Fight for Right" Movement. Here are its foundation principles, what we may call the articles of association, which all its members will hold in common:—

We believe that Great Britain in this War is fighting, not for her own safety and honour alone, but for the best interests of the whole world. We and our Allies stand for Right against Might; for a right ideal of free civilisation against a wrong ideal of organised power. We are fighting the battle of humanity.

But England is the sum of all her citizens. We, every man and woman, are called upon to fight in this battle. THERE ARE, OR SHOULD BE, NO NON-COMBATANTS IN THIS WAR.

WE are England. Her past lives in us; her future will come from us. Her survival hangs, at the present moment, on our courage, patience, and self-sacrifice. A huge responsibility and a huge opportunity is offered to every man and woman now alive.

The Fight for Right Movement is intended to draw together all who realise this: and by their help to bring home its truth to every citizen. We have only one rule, but it is a rule of the widest application—

TO FIGHT FOR RIGHT TILL RIGHT BE WON: by perpetual effort in right and unfaltering thought, wise and courageous speech, diligent and unselfish work.

The Movement is still at the initial stages of its activity. It is trying to spread knowledge of its principles and to enrol members. Its programme of work includes propaganda by the spoken and written word and fellowship in common assemblies, where music and noble literature will co-operate with the living mind in its endeavour to impart conviction and to kindle hope. Readers of our columns since the beginning of the war know that all our sympathy is enlisted on the side of self-surrender to national duty, willing obedience to the instincts of chivalry, and the conviction that we are fighting for something of infinite moral value for the world. We shall watch the work of the "Fight for Right" Movement with eager interest. We wish for it a sphere of large and growing influence. We hope that its achievements will equal the breadth and nobility of its aims.

VERSE.

A CHEER TO THEM.

HERE's a cheer to them, loud and long,
To the lads who are far away!
A cheer to the lads who are bold and strong
And fight for the old and grey.
Are we grey folks at home? 'Tis true;
Are we old? We are young within;
And the battle we fight, dear lads, with you
Is a battle we both must win.

There's a place by the old fireside,
There's a smile you remember well,
There's ever a thought of tender pride
For you, where the old folks dwell.
You are out for a long, long fight,
For a triumph that yet shall be—
For the name of England and English right,
And for all men's liberty!

So, our love to you, far away,
 Dear lads who were ne'er so dear,
 And take from our hearts upon Christmas Day

The gift of an English cheer ;
 You will hear in your hearts, we know,
 O'er the fields and the salt sea-foam,
 You will hear "God bless you!" in the winds that blow

From the land of the folks at home.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

ON THE FINAL SUBMISSION OF THE TYROLESE, A.D. 1809.

It was a moral end for which they fought ;
 Else how, when mighty Thrones were put to shame,
 Could they, poor Shepherds, have preserved an aim,
 A resolution, or enlivening thought ?
 Nor hath that moral good been vainly sought ;
 For in their magnanimity and fame Powers have they left, an impulse, and a claim Which neither can be overturned nor bought.
 Sleep, Warriors, sleep ! Among your hills repose !
 We know that ye, beneath the stern control
 Of awful prudence, keep the unvanquished soul :
 And when, impatient of her guilt and woes, Europe breaks forth ; then, Shepherds !
 shall ye rise
 For perfect triumph o'er your enemies.

WORDSWORTH.

Assuming the reality of the Father,
 it seems to me the truest thing, and therefore the grandest, to lean like a child, and, like a child, to be strong through leaning. Anyhow, was there not a certain charming sweetness, a certain exquisite tenderness, in the heroic firmness with which Christ bore his lot ; and was not the peculiar sweetness and tenderness which distinguished his staunch endurance all through, attributable largely to the source from which he drew his courage and his strength, namely, to his faith in the invisible Father ?
 One has seen lips grandly knit in suffering which yet were scarcely beautiful, though not a groan or a plaint escaped them ; and, again, one has seen lips knit in suffering which, though equally close-set, were softly beautiful the while.

 There are different ways of bearing bravely : there is the hard, cold, stoical way, to which you may attain, if you are made for it, without the Father ; and there is the way of smiling gentleness, which is likely, I think, to be best learned and exemplified by those who can say to themselves, as they enter into the cloud, "We are not alone, because the Father is with us."

S. A. TIPPLE.

ALMIGHTY GOD, the fountain of Holiness, who by thy Word and thy Spirit dost conduct all thy servants in the ways of peace and sanctity ; grant unto me so truly to repent of my sins, so carefully to reform my errors, so diligently to watch over all my actions, that I may never willingly transgress thy holy laws ; but that it may be the work of my life to obey thee ; the joy of my soul to please thee ; the satisfaction of all my hopes, and the perfection of my desires, to be with thee in thy Kingdom of Grace and Glory. Amen.

THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT MOVEMENT.

IN words which have become the name of a National movement, Sir Francis Younghusband describes the War as a "Fight for Right." No description could be more apt. Let Germans say what they will about the expansion of a nation's life : apart from Right, Life is but a brute force, and the expansion of it but aggressive selfishness.
 This is what we are fighting, an immor-talised and therefore barbaric power which recognises no law but that of its own self-interest. Against that insurgent barbarism we are fighting for the conception of a general Right, a Right which knits together nations and men in the broad equities of Freedom.

Freedom ! To us Englishmen that word is dear. It is hallowed by a thousand years of heroism, suffering, achievement : it stands for the greatness of our Motherland and the meaning of her history. Manifest in the structure of our society, potent (though unseen) in the deep foundations of character, eloquent on many an immortal page, it is the strength of our present life and the light of our hope. And not of our hope alone, for the Divine vocation which makes men free is a general vocation, and the right which that vocation constitutes is a general right. The work that has been wrought in this our Motherland, the Freedom for which our fathers died,

 and which has been gradually wrought into the very texture of our life and the fabric of our State by centuries of patient labour, has a universal meaning and a universal value. In fighting for England to-day we are fighting for Humanity, for its largest possibilities and noblest hopes.

The greatest earthly thing has been given into our charge ; what shall we do ? Non nobis Domine, no worthiness of ours has earned for us that high trust.
 Therefore, reverently and penitently—for our shortcomings are not a few—let us purge our minds of all selfishness and sloth, of all the petty things that have hitherto hindered, and let us consecrate ourselves humbly and unreservedly to the cause which makes this war a Crusade and this moment uniquely great. Sursum corda, let us lift up our hearts. On many a field our kinsmen have died : let us make ourselves one with them in a sacred unity of self-sacrifice.

Many of us had been thinking these thoughts, but we had been thinking separately and working separately. Sir Francis Younghusband calls upon us to join hands. "The Fight for Right Movement" is not only an uplifting movement, it is an integrating movement. It is an effort to unite, by a common purpose and uncommon work, all those who single-mindedly care for the spiritual values now at stake.

We are busy with loans, munition-making and recruiting. Sir Francis Younghusband calls upon us for something more ; he calls upon us for a moral effort. We at home—I who write these words, and you who read them—are non-combatants. Yet there is a profound and vital sense in which it is true to say, that in this War there can be no non-combatants. You and I have a part to play which is an active part and an essential part. Our kinsmen are fighting ; no less than they, we must put our very selves into the War, all that we have, all that we are, all that we can do. At the moment England calls upon each man for his utmost and his best. Unless the soul of the nation is aroused, unless all hearts and minds (as well as hands) are integrated in a common national purpose, England's strength will remain largely a latent strength. Not by such half-heartedness can this war be fought as it should be fought or won as it should be won. If we be half-hearted it means this—it means that we prefer other things to our Motherland and her Cause, other things to Right, and are content to see England pay for our preference with the blood of others.

In the first weeks after the war a new spirit was everywhere manifest. There was a new brotherliness, a new unselfishness in the land; autumn days were close at hand, but there was a breath of Spring in the air. We felt the quickening of a new life. The war had made men national, fraternally national. Before the War many of us had worked in faith and hope for some such reward, for some such awakening. War had spoken with a more potent voice, and the new spirit which we had seen as a far-off possibility had become a present fact. Thus there came to England a great opportunity. Old things had passed away—old controversies and enmities, old mistrusts—and men who had been far apart found themselves side by side, united by a sympathy and purpose which transcended all differences. The Pool of Siloam was stirred. Outraged Right gave to Duty a new voice, and the august message uplifted the nation's life. That uplifting was and is the opportunity. The Nation's new mood must be made a conviction, a purpose, a habit: its new unity must be strengthened and deepened.

What has hitherto hindered us? Why are so many things wrong in this land of ours? One word will suffice to indicate the answer, selfishness. Men had thought severally of themselves, they had worked severally for themselves. The general brotherhood constituted by the essential facts of human nature was unrecognised or disregarded. When war burst upon us, men discovered something greater than themselves, something worth working for, something worth dying for. That discovery must not be allowed to lapse. Rather must it be extended, and become the discovery of something which, in the new days of peace, will be worth living for.

"The Fight for Right Movement" arose out of the War, but its hope and purpose reach out far beyond the war. Its message is a permanent message. Sursum corda, lift up your hearts, lift them up unselfishly against selfishness; lift them up in self-sacrificing effort to establish Right—to establish Right, not only in the councils of Nations and State affairs, but in all human institutions and the daily lives of men. That is the message which Sir Francis Younghusband brings to us. It is a message, not for this war-time alone, but for all times. It is a message, not to Englishmen alone, but to all men. It is a message to Humanity.

OUR DUTY TOWARDS MINISTERS WHO HAVE ENLISTED.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your fine editorial on the grave matter of the duty of our theological students and our Ministers during this tremendous world-crisis has again raised the question of their entering the ranks of the defenders, not alone of their country, but of Christian civilisation and human liberty. In your eloquent and inspiring plea for the consideration by our younger ministers of the present summons of the youth of the nation to the colours, there is much food for their anxious thought. I preface what I have to add about it by repeating what I felt bound to say some months ago, that there is something so vital in the choice that you place before my young brothers that I cannot intrude on their prayerful communion with God and their own consciences in coming to a fateful decision involving the issues, not only of life and death for them, but of the change, the while, in the whole tenour of lives dedicated to the holy task of the Ministry of Christ. In that solemn choice I leave the young Minister to await the answer to his prayer, "Speak, Lord, thy servant heareth."

To my dear young brethren, who in reply hear the call to leave all and obey what is, to them, at this great time, the voice of Christ telling them to take up their Cross and follow him, though it lead them through the gates of death, I say with all my soul, "Go forth to the fight for your dear native land, for blessed freedom, and for the reign of justice and humanity throughout the world, for a Christianity blasphemed by calls on God to give His benediction to methods of warfare of which Tamerlane and Attila would have been ashamed, and by the horrid blasphemies of the so-called Ministers of Christ who have desecrated God's House in the Vaterland by instilling as a Christian duty the turning of Christendom into a shambles of crucified humanity amid scenes of slaughter, fire, destruction, and orgies of brutality to women and children that blast eternally the German name."

To my young brother ministers who answer this call, I say it is as true a Ministry of Christ as that which they leave. If ever there was a time in which to His followers Christ was saying, "I bring not peace but a sword," it is now. The battle is joined between God and the Devil, and if the powers of darkness are not to triumph and submerge Christianity, this awful outburst of diabolic power that takes the name of German Kultur must be hurled back to the hell from which it came. In this battle I see a veritable crusade, and Ministers who take part in it are servants of the Cross. I put in a plea for all my brother ministers who stay at home to come forward to take the places of those who go as often as possible and with as little cost to the congregation as may be. I long to take a share in this work myself. I do not need to plead with the congregations to keep the place warm of the returning soldiers of Christ who will come back newly inspired by a fellowship with the sufferings of their Master, with a closer contact with the deep things of life and death, and with the spiritual revival to which it gives birth. Let all the managers of our trust funds for Ministers take council together as to their power of financing the temporary Ministry by supplies of the vacant pulpits. If that finds only a part of the needful subventions, then I am confident that our laity will once more show the generous regard for them that I have as good reason as any to know, and take measures to meet this need. To do this we must call together our several boards of trustees, of ministerial funds, and appoint delegates to meet and formulate plans in consultation with representatives of the District Associations. There are quite a number of Ministers without pulpits who, I am sure, will be willing, for comparatively small fees, to occupy the vacated pulpits, or to take the places of settled Ministers who, in turn, may fill them. The amount of income required, over and above that of existing trusts available, would be ascertained and raised in each district and our Churches and Ministers alike would do their bit in the battle for all that makes life worth living in this fateful hour.—Yours, &c.,

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

Gee Cross, Dec. 6, 1915.

[We endorse most cordially Mr. Dowson's plea. Some simple machinery ought to be organised at once to enable ministers of military age to go, if the voice of duty and the instincts of chivalry bid them do so, without grave anxiety about their work and their homes. Those at home must do the work without any cost to them.—ED. OF INQ.]

NEW YEAR'S SERVICE OF COMMEMORATION AND CONSECRATION

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The Anglican and Evangelical Nonconformist Churches are arranging to hold "Intercessory" Services on Sunday, January 2; and the Rochdale and District Fellowship of Unitarian Churches suggested to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association that Special Services should be held in our group of churches on the same day. The Executive Committee at their meeting on December 8 cordially approved of this suggestion; and they recommend that on the first Sunday of the New Year, one Service should partake of the character of a Service of Commemoration of those who have fallen on the battlefield, and of Consecration to the duties and responsibilities of all our people in this time of National crisis and peril.

It was further resolved very heartily to commend the appeal of the British Red Cross Society that Collections be taken on Sunday, January 2nd, on behalf of the Fund for the Relief of the Sick and Wounded Men on the various battle-fronts. A letter addressed to the ministers and secretaries of our congregations, signed by the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the President of the National Conference, in support of the appeal, will be issued along with a statement of what the British Red Cross Society and the Order of St. John of Jerusalem are doing to-day for sick and wounded sailors and soldiers.—Yours, &c.

W. COPELAND BOWIE,
Secretary.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

CHEAP BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS.

THIS year our Christmas gifts must be modest, though they need not on that account lose any of their value. They will still be the symbols of the best things in life, goodwill and affection, and if they take the form of books, as in wise households they often do, they may be more precious than rubies though they cost but a few pence. We do not mean that great literature and noble printing do not go well together, and for that the fit price must be paid; but the best things are never degraded by a humble dress, so long as it is seemly and not unpleasing to the eye. This year we are fortunately to be spared the sumptuous gift-book, a form of merchandise which only tempts the careless buyer on account of its expensiveness. How many of the loudly trumpeted wares of past seasons, after dragging out a precarious existence of a few months in suburban drawing-rooms, have sunk into oblivion. Certainly no self-respecting library would receive them. In their gaudy company—as domineering as that of most plutocrats—the modest and enduring virtues of cheap books may not shine very brightly; but if a gift is meant to reveal ourselves rather than the contents of our pockets we shall find more scope for the display of sympathy and taste in the discriminating expenditure of pence than in the squandering of pounds. In any case for most of us it can be no question of pounds this year. Fortunately the area of choice for those who have little money to spend grows ever wider. At the cost of only a few shillings we may endow our friends with infinite treasure.

'Everyman's Library' continues, to expand. The most notable additions in the new batch of volumes is Green's 'Short History of the English People,' in 2 vols., with an appendix by Mr. R. P. Farley, continuing the narrative, chiefly on its social side, from the battle of Waterloo to the present day; Cardinal Newman's lectures on 'University Education with an Introduction,' by Mr. Wilfrid Ward; and perhaps most attractive of all at a time when we need quietness and strength, a selection from the writings of William Penn, including 'The Fruits of Solitude,' a rich mine of meditative wisdom dear to the heart of R. L. S. (London: J. M. Dent & Sons, 1s. net per vol.)

The publishers of the Home University Library have issued only two volumes this season. 'Poland,' by W. Alison Phillips is an excellent summary of the history of the rise and dismemberment of Poland and her long struggle for liberty. There is no need to emphasise its timeliness. 'Political Thought in England—the Utilitarians from Bentham to J. S. Mill,' by W. L. Davidson, completes the important survey of our political development on the intellectual side from the time of the rise of the modern state. The companion volumes which appeared a few months ago have been written by Mr. G. P. Gooch and Mr. Ernest Barker. Taken together they will help to correct the popular impression that thinkers have little influence in the practical tasks of government. No theory of the State has ever dominated the English mind to such an extent as to produce a dull and dangerous uniformity. The individualism of conscience has always acted as a corrective to the claims of logic. But political thinking has determined political action to a far greater extent than many people suppose. This observation finds its best illustration in Bentham and his school described in the present volume. (London: Williams & Norgate, 1s. net per vol.)

We welcome with great cordiality the first six volumes of 'Every Irishman's Library.' They comprise 'Irish Oratory,' edited by Professor T. M. Kettle; 'Legends of Saints and Sinners,' collected and translated from the Irish by Dr. Douglas Hyde; 'The Book of Irish Poetry,' edited by Mr. A. Percival Graves; 'Humours of Irish Life,' edited by Mr. Charles L. Graves; 'Essays and Poems,' by Thomas Davis, selected by Mr. T. W. Rolleston; and Maxwell's 'Wild Sports of the West,' edited by Lord Dunraven. A word or two of special praise for the first two must not be taken as lack of respect for the rest, for all of them will open a delightful and unfamiliar world to most English readers. Ireland has always possessed more native gift for oratory than England. Its passion and glow are best known in Burke, and Mr. Kettle opens his volume with the classic speeches on American Taxation and Conciliation with the Colonies; but from the reader's point of view its value consists in the selection from Henry Flood, Grattan and Curran, and others only less brilliant than this central group, whose words are hidden away in volumes difficult of access or the files of newspapers. Dr. Hyde's volume represents a vast amount of original labour. A few of the legends which he has collected here are taken from his 'Love Songs of Connacht,' but most of them have never seen the light before. He has translated them as they were taken down from the lips of the peasantry. They have an equal value for the study of folk-lore and of the primitive religious sentiments of the Irish people. But they have also a quality of haunting beauty and spiritual refinement which will commend them to the love of literature. The secret of it is hinted at, if it is not explained in the following passage from Dr. Hyde's introduction: "When we consider the collection as a whole, we find that its purely Irish aspect is apparent in many ways, and in none more than in the very characteristic dove-tailing of what is Pagan into what is Christian. But its omissions are even more distinctly Irish than its inclusions. In most countries, for instance, the Devil is the great outstanding anthropomorphic conception added to the folk-lore of Europe by the introduction of Christianity, and later the belief in witches, who trafficked directly or indirectly with the Evil One, became extraordinarily prevalent and powerful. Now the most striking fact about our collection is that the Devil personified rarely appears in it at all, and witches never." (London: T. Fisher Unwin, 2s. 6d. net per vol.)

Messrs. Constable have just sent us Professor Peabody's 'Mornings in the College Chapel,' first and second series; 'Afternoons in the College Chapel,' and 'Sunday Evenings in the College Chapel,' in four small volumes. Professor Peabody has cultivated the art of effective brevity with a success which few can emulate. The short addresses, which he was in the habit of giving to the students of Harvard at morning prayers, succeed admirably in the two-fold object of producing an atmosphere of quietness and worship and of imparting a stimulus to thought. Alike in simplicity of feeling and their wide mental horizons they are meditations in the truest sense of the word. (2s. net per vol.)

With this rapid glance at some of the recent cheap issues in serious literature we must be content, only reminding the fastidious reader if there is nothing here to his taste, that he cannot fail to find something among the cheap books good enough for his friend, unless after all he is thinking more of the gilt outside than of the gold within. Even this year of bitter loss has brought us another of Professor Gilbert Murray's translations from Euripides—the Alcestis (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1s. net.) And you can gain admission to this world of tragic beauty, and perhaps find there the key to the hopes and fears of your own heart, with the money which many of us squander on newspapers we do not need in the course of a single week.

There be many shapes of mystery;
And many things God brings to be,
Past hope or fear.

And the end men looked for cometh not,
And a path is there where no man thought.

So hath it fallen here.

THE PERSONAL LIFE OF JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, THE POTTER. By his great-granddaughter, Julia Wedgwood. Revised and Edited by C. H. Herford. London: Macmillan & Co., 12s. net.

THE Life of Josiah Wedgwood was written by Miss Meteyard in two handsome volumes many years ago. It was natural that a descendant of such rare literary gifts as Miss Julia Wedgwood should have ransacked the voluminous family papers for herself and found much that she felt was good enough for the public eye. This substantial book is the result. It was the loving occupation of her declining years, an act of piety to her ancestry. At her death the manuscript passed in its incomplete state into the hands of her friend Professor Herford, with a request that it should be revised and published. This task has been accomplished with all faithfulness and skill, but we doubt whether the account of one of our industrial pioneers of the eighteenth century will attract the reader so much as the affectionate tribute which Professor Herford has written in memory of Miss Wedgwood herself. Our only complaint is that it is much too short. We could have pardoned some excisions in the latter part of the volume in order to find room for a selection from her letters and some account in greater detail of the growth of her own strong and original mind. As it is, the portrait that is given of her here is one that lives. It is written with the intimacy of affection tempered by the reverence which a man naturally feels for a highly gifted woman many years older than himself. Miss Wedgwood was the pupil both of Martineau and Maurice. She had thus absorbed some of the most kindling intellectual and religious influences of her generation, and she honoured her teachers by disagreeing with them on many questions and knowing clearly why she did so. "The Moral Ideal" was her one book, for the rest of her literary activity was simply a by-product of that large enterprise. We agree entirely with Professor Herford's judgment of its value, nor shall we readily forget the sense of discovery, the delight of being gripped by a master mind, that accompanied a first reading of it many years ago. This volume is no rival, but many people will enjoy turning over these pleasant records of a family to which industry, science, and letters are indebted in almost equal measure. It is fit company for the recently published Letters of her kinswoman, Emma Darwin.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

REV. NESTOR RAYSON WILLIAMS.

As briefly announced in our columns last week the Rev. Nestor Rayson Williams, formerly Unitarian minister at Merthyr, died on November 29 in his 81st year. Mr. Williams was the second son of the Rev. Thomas Rayson Williams (1805-1850), independent minister at Templeton, Pem., and was born November 23 1834. In June, 1849 he was admitted as a student to the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen. Like both his brothers, Mr. Ben Thomas Williams, Q.C. (1832-90), and the Rev. Heber Williams (1839-76), he became a Unitarian during his college course. Owing to a break-down in health he had to withdraw from college at the end of his third session, and he retired to live with his mother. After a time he found his health re-established, and went to resume his studies under the direction of the Rev. Henry Solly at Lancaster. In 1860 he accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of the Twyn yr Odyn Unitarian Church, Merthyr Tydvil. Here he was a popular and much respected minister, making himself generally useful, for the long period of thirty-four years, when the death of his wife and only child—a son of 20 years—brought about such a state of depression that he felt he must retire from the ministry. He withdrew to his old home at Merryvale, Templeton, where he spent the remainder of his days quietly and happily with his two sisters, who survive to mourn his loss. The few sermons he published found a ready sale, and were read with great interest:—(1) On the death of Thomas Stephens, author of the Prize Essay on the Literature of the Kymry, a valued member of his church, 1875; (2) 'Are Unitarians Christians?' on the eviction of the minister and congregation of Llwynrhydown, 1876; (3) 'The Sin Against the Holy Ghost,' 1878; (4) On the assassination of Mr. Burke and Lord Frederick Cavendish, 1882. His remains were interred on Thursday, December 2, in the burying-ground adjoining the little chapel where his father was first minister. Mr. Phillips, the pastor loci conducting the funeral service.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is one of M. Vandervelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depots for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

Note.—Raffia baskets (about six inches in diameter, with lid), in many colours, made by wounded soldiers in hospital, may be had from Mrs. Allen. The proceeds go to help the work of the "Œuvre Belge," under the direction of the Baronne Robert de Brocqueville.

The supply of civilian clothing is at present quite sufficient for the demand. A notice will be inserted in this paper when more is needed.

Contributions of Money and Clothing should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

It will be a great convenience if all senders of parcels will enclose their names and addresses and a list of contents in each parcel.

A MESSAGE FROM THE FRONT.

BY THE REV. H. D. ROBERTS.

THE following message from the Rev. H. D. Roberts to his old friends at Hope Street Church, Liverpool, appears in the Church Calendar for December:—

Your minister has asked me to send a message of some kind to insert in the next issue of the Church Calendar. Greeting and remembrance come naturally enough from these strange scenes where I find myself, which sometimes seem a dream, and sometimes make all except themselves seem dream-like.

But what sort of message? There is so much to be said. A thousand topics of absorbing interest crowd upon me, all of them real, vital things that count; but they cannot now be made articulate. These unique Labour Battalions themselves, their personnel, their psychology, their form of national service, make an immense claim on the student of life who is privileged to see them from the inside. But this, too, is too intimate as yet for public treatment. Our military position cannot be discussed. We are not actual fighters, though we grow accustomed to shells—the "star shells" at night affording us fireworks illumination. We know the condition of our defences, but on that silence is obligatory.

We wish that the same reticence were in many directions obligatory at home, so ill-informed and harmful is the whining of a certain section of the press. Our men, democrats to the core, though for the moment under military discipline, are convinced that these traitorous whiners are out for sensation, financial profits, and class domination. These volunteers of ours hate conscription as a principle, whatever be the immediate case for the present emergency, because they think they see in it an ulterior motive of grinding the workers. But they (i.e., the men out at the front) have a right to talk. They are up against reality, they see what the talkers at home do not see, and they have a right to feel a bitter scorn of those who comfortably jeopardise the great cause for which they have freely given themselves.

Enduring privations: often wet-footed for a fortnight on end, often soaked through without possibility of change either of under or outer garments, camped at times on a swamp, often facing early dawn with the beaten feeling that one poor creature of flesh and blood is not equal to the awful weight of things—these men who voluntarily face all this may, indeed, at times ask, "What am I enduring it all for? I had a good fire at home." But no sooner is the question put than the answer comes, in effect: "I am a free man, freely enduring for all that makes life worth living in the world, liberty and justice, and all the goods of freedom, and it is worth while." I cannot do better than send this as a message from those who know and do. My own discomforts in my present place as colonel's clerk are as nothing to those of our "Pioneers."

I may say to the members of Hope Street Church that no shade of discord arises between the sects here. You may be Church of England or Roman Catholic, or of one of the Protestant Dissenting bodies, sometimes called by facetious sergeants-major "fancy religions," it is all the same. A critic might say that the whole business is one merely of official routine. But the fact is that Life and Work, in a word, Doing, constitute the veritable essence of human existence here. Things are too big for inessential squabbling, and there is too much at stake. As I write here, in slush and discomfort, I am more convinced than ever that the projection of our really Catholic principles of religion is the great and effective factor in human and religious relationships.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

A Special General Meeting of the Fund was held at Essex Hall, London, on Wednesday, 1st inst., Rev. W. G. Tarrant presiding, when a number of alterations in the By-Laws, as adopted by the Board of Managers, were approved and so became effective. The changes made are due chiefly to the recent substantial enlargement of the income of the Fund in consequence of the handsome legacy received from the late Mr. Philip Holt. This increased income, and the wider terms of the trust constituted by the Philip Holt Fund, enable the managers to improve the benefits to the members.

New tables of insurance, giving rather better rates, have been adopted, to take the place for future beneficiaries of the tables hitherto operative, and arrangements have been made for an extra allowance towards the final premium of present members so as to place them practically in the same position as those who join the Fund in future. The maximum contribution towards premiums is raised from £10 to £15, and an extra bonus will, for the present, be added in consideration of war conditions. Under the Philip Holt Fund an entirely new table for Children's Education insurance is offered to the members, and the maximum of £15 may be calculated as applying to this and the ordinary insurance taken together.

As soon as the new tables and By-laws are printed, copies will be sent to all members of the Fund, and a circular will be issued to ministers explaining the changes which have been made.

CHRISTMAS APPEALS.

BELL STREET MISSION.

The Rev. A. Golland writes from 46, Bell Street, Edgeware Road, making an appeal on behalf of the charitable funds of the Bell Street Mission. It is true, he says, that owing to war allowances "many families which, in the past, we have helped, need for the moment little beyond, in some cases, sympathetic counsel. But the great rise in the cost of living has seriously affected many households in which are no men of military age. A class of people which once rarely or never needed help is becoming very poor, and the sick and infirm are always with us. I would gladly give details of our present experiences and work to anyone sufficiently interested to inquire. Subscriptions for the Poor's Purse, which is empty; the general funds for Sunday School and Club purposes; or special funds for Christmas needs, would be very gratefully received and carefully used."

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL.

The Rev. W. J. Piggott writes from the Blackfriars Mission, Stamford Street, S.E., appealing for funds in aid of the various charitable institutions connected with it. The needs of the moment are very urgent in this particular district, "the general rise in prices has made the strain very great in many homes, and where there are invalid parents or aged widowed mothers whose sons are away on active service, the need of timely help every now and again is very great. There remain also our usual Christmas Parties, sadly curtailed this year, alas, and the calls for help from the social side of our mission, and Junior Choir and Lend a Hand League. For these reasons I shall be very grateful for gifts of food and coal tickets, Surgical Aid Society letters, cast-off clothing, and contributions to the Minister's Poor's Purse, all of which may be sent to me at the Mission."

RHYL STREET MISSION.

THE Rev. W. H. Rose writes from 147, Essex Road, Leyton, N.E., as follows:—"Will you kindly permit me to make my usual Christmas Appeal for Rhyl Street Mission? I shall be very pleased to receive substantial help for the Poor's Purse. It is a mistake to assume there is no distress amongst the poor because large numbers of workers are doing well. Amongst the people who are connected with the Missions—especially the old and infirm—there is much distress owing to the high prices of coal and food. I shall also be [grateful for subscriptions to the Children's Christmas Parties Fund, books or subscriptions for the Sunday School Library, and the Congregational Library, boots, shoes, and all kinds of cast-off clothing. I know there are many special appeals connected with the war, but I trust the constant and ever-recurring needs of the Missions will not suffer." Parcels should be addressed to Mr. Rose at the Mission, 4, Rhyl Street, Kentish Town, N.W.; letters containing cheques and postal orders to his private address.

DINGLEY PLACE MISSION,

The Rev. Frederick Summers writes from 4, Durlay Road, Stamford Hill, N., as follows:—"Will you please allow me to make my annual appeal to kind friends for their help for the poor at this time of the year? I shall be grateful for donations for the Poor's Purse, for new or cast-off clothing, for books, &c. I am sorry to say that this year on account of the rise of prices, aged people and widows &c., are much worse off than usual. Gifts in kind should be sent to the Domestic Mission, Dingley Place, St. Luke's, E.C., and letters to my private address."

MANSFORD STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

THE Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from 117, Mansford Street, Bethnal Green:—"I am well aware that there are many claims in these days on the generosity of your readers; nevertheless, may I say that I am hoping to receive their contributions to our Poor's Purse and Christmas Fund as usual? It is true that there is no great distress now, but still, even in the best of times, there are always a number of claims on the Poor's Purse—some small pensions to be continued, and cases of illness to be relieved. Further, the teachers are most anxious that the scholars should have their Christmas Parties as in previous years. May I, therefore, once again ask your readers for contributions to these Funds?"

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Barnard Castle.—A successful sale of work was held in the Free Christian (Unitarian) School, on Thursday, December 2nd. All the goods were practically disposed of, and the proceeds amounted to about £52. The Rev. J. B. Robinson opened the sale.

Birmingham, Old Meeting.—A very successful meeting was held on Friday, December 3, the proceeds of which were destined for the War Sewing Fund. The schoolroom was filled with a very enthusiastic audience who thoroughly appreciated the programme of folk-songs given by Mr. John Mahler. His refined and artistic singing made a great appeal, and all agreed that this was a most delightful way of swelling the funds. Mrs. Bernard Allen was good enough to come and give an account of the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund, and her simple, tragic story deeply moved her audience. Much has already been done in support of this effort, and having come into personal touch with Mrs. Allen we hope now to redouble our efforts to help in the work of succouring the wounded Belgians in France. Our thanks are due to the faithful band of workers who give their time and money to further this work. Before the end of the meeting an appeal was made for a collection for the benefit of the seventy men connected with the church who have enlisted, so that each may receive a greeting on Christmas Day, and the response was handsome.

Blackpool, South Shore.—The Unitarian Church has sustained a serious loss in the death of its Hon. Secretary, Mr. J. M. Taylor, who passed away in his sleep quite unexpectedly on November 30th, at the age of 48. Mr. Taylor never enjoyed robust health, but he had been a most active and devoted member of the church ever since it was established, and for several years, when the congregation was without a minister, he conducted the services himself. The congregation has lost another member who will be greatly missed in Mrs. Davies, formerly of Dukinfield, who also died in her sleep on November 29th, at the age of 70.

Liverpool, Ullet Road Church.—Mrs. Bernard Allen's visit to Liverpool drew a large number of people which nearly filled Ullet Road Church Hall, on December 4th, a Saturday afternoon signalised by an unceasing downpour. All the churches were represented, even including a district so remote as St. Helens, and there were several other sympathisers present unconnected with our particular group. The large audience was expressive, not only of the interest felt for the Belgian Hospital Fund and Mrs. Bernard Allen's splendid work in it, but the untiring efforts of the Rev. J. C. and Mrs. Odgers to make the meeting a success. The uncompromising deluge prevented many from attending, however, and there is no doubt that an afternoon of average weather would have meant a crowded hall. Mr. Hugh Rathbone, perforce but unwillingly absent, sent a very sympathetic message and the promise of a gift of £50. The Rev. J. C. Odgers presided, and was supported on the platform by Mrs. Allen, Sir William and Lady Bowring, Sir Edward Russell, Mr. Herbert Rathbone and Mr. C. Sydney Jones. Mrs. Allen's simple but forceful way of describing the extraordinary work accomplished by the Fund to which she has so nobly given herself was calculated to go straight to her hearers' hearts, even if these are not already prepared by an imaginative admiration for the achievement. All the speakers voiced the splendour and awfulness which the name of Belgium, the proto-martyr of the war, calls up in feeling minds. Mr. Herbert Rathbone, Sir Edward Russell and Mr. C. Sydney Jones reiterated the story, immortal but not even for a moment to be forgotten, of Belgium's sacrifice of herself for the value she set on the freedom of the soul of the world. Our debt cannot indeed be reckoned in terms of any currency, but such a sublime sacrifice as hers demands sacrifices from all who benefit by it. THE INQUIRER Fund, so well responded to and so practically and efficiently worked, has indeed done wonders in its own department; but the need never ceases but rather augments as the war goes on, calling for continued remembrance, effort and self-denial. Tea was provided by Ullet Road Church after the meeting, and a collection for the Fund taken at the doors, the amount of which is stated elsewhere. The assistance given to this fine work by Ullet Road has been very continuous and conspicuous throughout, and the church may be congratulated on its last effort.

London, Essex Church.—The congregation of Essex Church is mourning with its minister, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, the sudden and overwhelming loss that has befallen him in the death of his wife, after an illness of little more than three days. This calamity, coming as it does before the close of the first year of a new ministry, when the faces of all around are of new and as yet untried friends, and while the pangs of separation from a devoted congregation in the North are still keen and fresh, make this sorrow especially grievous. The congregation realises with keen appreciation and sympathy the untiring efforts made by Mrs. Weatherall to make a home in her new surroundings, to know the members of the widely scattered congregation, and to welcome all friends, old and new, to Essex Church. It is a grievous thing that the end has come with such tragic swiftness, leaving so many bright hopes unfulfilled; and the sympathy of the whole congregation is given in unstinted measure to their minister and his son and daughter in their great sorrow. The funeral took place at the Golder's Green Crematorium on Tuesday, when many friends were present from Essex Church and Bank Street Chapel, Bolton. The service was conducted by the Rev. Bertram Lister of Hackney, who was formerly assistant-minister with Mr. Weatherall at Bolton.

London, Stratford.—A Sale of Work was held on Saturday, November 20th, and on Monday, the 22nd, at the Unitarian Church for the purpose of raising funds for church expenses and for ministerial services. The sale was opened on the first day by Dr. Hargrove, the chair being taken by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson; and on the second day by Mrs. Sidney Martineau, Mrs. Alfred Wilson presiding.

Midland Guilds' Union.—A United Meeting of the Union was held at All Souls' Church, Wolverhampton, on Saturday, November 20th. After tea an address was given by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, in which he pleaded for a great committal on the part of Guild members to religion and the religious life, which he felt to be the great need of this age. A discussion, in which the Revs. H. C. Hawkins and J. A. Shaw, Messrs. Smith, Teasdale and Wood and Mrs. E. W. Martin took part, followed, and a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Thomas. The President, the Rev. H. Warnock, occupied the chair, and most of the guilds in the Union were represented.

Plymouth.—On the Sundays in November a special course of services has been given with the help of visiting preachers and the support of a grant for the purpose from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. On the first Sunday in the month the Rev. A. E. O'Connor of Torquay spoke on 'The Creeds, are They Helps or Hindrances,' and on following Sundays the Rev. W. H. Burgess spoke on 'Strong Points in the Unitarian Faith'; the Rev. A. C. Fox of Bath on 'The Philosophy of Thomas Gradgrind, or Faith and Facts'; and the Rev. Simon Jones of Swansea on 'Unitarian Christianity and the War.' Cards of invitation, each enclosed with a Unitarian pamphlet, were widely distributed, and in this way as well as by the services interest has been aroused.

Southern Advisory Committee.—Mr. Stanley Gibbon of Birmingham, Mr. H. C. Hawkins of Oldbury, and Mr. Neone Raad of Ringwood, having completed their term of "probationers preparing for the ministry," and having passed the prescribed examinations, have received their full ministerial certificates entitling them to be placed on the ministerial roll. (Signed) W. Blake Odgers, Chairman; Joseph Wood, Secretary.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

EVENING PLAY CENTRES.

Once again Mrs. Humphrey Ward makes her annual appeal for funds to carry on the admirable work of the Play Centres, pointing out that this, too, is a war claim which cannot easily be ignored by those who care for children, and recognise that in them is the nation's hope for the future. "I urgently want a sum of £1,200 to carry us safely through the winter," she says, "or without it some of the Centres must be closed." Any one who will communicate with Mrs. Humphrey Ward for the purpose may go and see one of the Centres for themselves. If the weather is as bitter as it was recently, "the spectator will notice many a shivering child come in, sometimes crying with cold, and may watch how the Play Centre fires warm and comfort them; and in any weather he will see how the big boys and girls, for whom the unlighted streets swarm with temptations to gambling, loafing, pilfering, and loose behaviour, are swept into handwork and physical exercise, and go home after the two hours, happily tired, to bed." Subscriptions, large or small, sent to Mrs. Ward at Stocks, Tring, will be most gratefully acknowledged.

BOOKS FOR RUSSIAN PRISONERS.

In appealing for further help for the committee which was formed last year to supply books to Russian prisoners in Germany, Mr. Edmund Gosse gives the gratifying information that 2,000 volumes in the Russian language have been distributed, and nearly as many more were bought with the sum of £100 contributed. On November 28 at a meeting at the London Library, £83 more was collected. The Committee learn that in nearly all the various camps little libraries have been formed, and the appetite for definite knowledge is extraordinary. Both the captive Russian officers and the privates are ardently desirous of continuing their education, and it is remarkable that over and over again, in the military postcards that are sent, they beg that neither novels nor light literature of any kind shall be forwarded to them. With one accord they ask for manuals of scientific knowledge and aids to technical study. Books are wanted in the Russian language dealing with physics, chemistry, mechanics, biology, and, indeed, every department of science.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Owing to the Christmas holidays and the congestion of the postal arrangements the Inquirer will go to press on Tuesday next week. Advertisements and other communications must reach this office not later than Tuesday morning for insertion the same week.

We print to-day a series of letters of thanks which have come to us straight from the Belgian hospitals in France. More than any words of ours they will bring our readers into close contact with the work and enable them to see the good that is being done. There is nothing formal or official about it. It is the human relationships which have been established that make this work so beautiful. Indeed we think sometimes that the sympathy and friendship sent to men who are divorced from home and friends, and suffer from a feeling of loneliness which it is hard for us to understand, are almost as valuable as clothes and hospital equipment. Fortunately we are in a position to send both in ample measure, and so there need be no rivalry between them.

MAY we call the attention of our contributors to the fact that we have to go to press on Tuesday next week. We think it likely that some of our friends intend to send us special Christmas gifts, perhaps the money which in happier circumstances they would have spent upon presents in their own homes, and so we venture to warn them to post early. In any case we hope that the list in our Christmas number will be a good one. We still cherish the not impossible dream of reaching £10,000 by the end of the year.

FOR most of us the chief news this week is contained in the announcement, which appeared on Thursday morning, that Sir John French is coming home. He has been the symbol of the British army since the beginning of the war, quiet, business-like, of high courage, without any trace of ostentation or vain-glory. We have trusted him, and he has not betrayed our trust; for he has done great things, and his retirement helps us to realise how great they have been. It was a task of enormous difficulty which was suddenly thrust upon the Allied armies. The Germans had prepared all their plans for attack and counted upon a swift and overwhelming victory. Their rush has been stayed. The weight of numbers has been neutralised. Paris and the Channel ports are beyond their reach. And now they are held up, incapable of any effective action, while our new armies grow stronger day by day. It is an achievement of which we have every reason to be proud, and the conspicuous part which the genius of Sir John French has played in it entitles him to the national gratitude, which is the soldier's proudest reward.

THE popular mind does not always estimate at its true value the courage which prompts a man to retire from a post of high responsibility and to resign the coveted laurels of final victory into other hands. Sir John French, being the man that he is, we have every reason to suppose that he realises that the physical and mental strain have told severely upon him, or that the freshness of mind and the unspent energy of a younger man are desirable for the campaign of next spring. His retirement in order to undertake onerous but less responsible work at home reveals him as a patriot who cares more for the welfare of his country than for the glory of his own achievements.

IT is impossible not to be interested in all the reports of internal difficulties in Germany which reach us, and to hope that they are true; but they are far too vague and conflicting to give any ground for believing that the domination of the military party has been seriously weakened. The tone of the Chancellor's recent speech is in reality far more significant than reports of food riots. Behind all its bombast there is the confession of miserable failure and a growing anxiety. The statesman who feels that he has victory within his grasp does not abuse his enemies because they will not run away or come and grovel before him. He knows quite well that the Allies are not beaten, that they are not thinking of peace, and that the burden of continuing the war is a crushing weight upon Germany. We do not wonder that he is angry; but his anger does not deceive the world, and probably it fails to inspire fresh confidence among thoughtful men and women in his own country.

A VERY sharp Note has been sent by the United States to Austria, denouncing the attack on the Ancona, which it describes as "a wanton slaughter of defenceless non-combatants," and intimating that future diplomatic relations between the two countries must depend upon a definite repudiation of these methods of submarine warfare. America demands in explicit terms that the Austrian Government must denounce the sinking of the Ancona as an illegal and indefensible act; that the officer who perpetrated the deed must be punished, and that reparation by the payment of an indemnity must be made for the citizens of the United States who were killed or injured by the attack on the vessel. If Austria refuses to comply and the American Ambassador at Vienna is withdrawn a very anomalous situation will arise. It would make Austria the scapegoat for the long series of crimes begotten in Germany, for which the United States has received no reparation except fine words and the mockery of long delays.

THE Allies' attempt to link up with the Serbian army has failed. The defection of Greece made it a forlorn hope, but on all grounds of honour and policy it was worth the risk. The retirement upon Salonika was evidently foreseen as the only possible course, and it seems clear that this has been accomplished with great skill, and, considering the difficulty of the operation, with a minimum of loss. The havoc and loss for Serbia have been terrible, but it would be a grave mistake to exaggerate what has happened from a military point of view. That is the danger of viewing the war in local patches without any attempt at co-ordination. Panic or pessimism is quite out of place because we do not succeed at once in all we attempt and there are moments when in some portion of the field the situation is critical or even dangerous.

In any case the Serbians do not regard their cause as lost, and are in no mood for surrender. Reuter's Agency has issued a statement described as coming from "an authoritative Serbian source" which shows that she is still capable of taking a cool and hopeful view of the military situation. After expressing its approval of the decision of the Allies to remain at Salonika, on the ground that their presence will be a continual menace to the armies of the enemy and will also prevent the establishment at Salonika of an enemy submarine base, the statement continues:—

Neither the Serbian nation nor the Serbian army has lost heart or confidence in the Allies and their final success, but it is of the highest importance that their action in the Balkans shall be continued. An Allied force of 250,000 men at Salonika, the base of future operations, should be enough to hold the enemy, and in the near future, this force, together with the Russians from Bessarabia and 300,000 Serbs and Montenegrins, could conduct operations that would drive the enemy from the Balkans. As regards the present shortage of food it is certain that the country through which the Serbs are passing is poor and offers no resources, but it is not difficult to send food and other assistance to the Adriatic ports, for the Allied Fleets dominate these waters as they do the Mediterranean. So long as the Serbs remain in numbers in Albania they have nothing to fear from the population. In the meantime the Serbs look with confidence to the future.

No figures in connection with Lord Derby's scheme are to be announced till next Tuesday. In the meantime speculation about the probable results can serve no good purpose. One thing, however, is certain. An enormous number of men has been attested, and the last few days the rush was so great as to dislocate all the machinery at the recruiting offices. It is not too soon to express in the warmest possible terms the gratitude which we must feel to those who have come forward. We have reason to be proud of them. Whatever may be said about the pressure of public opinion and obedience to the crowd instinct their surrender of themselves is a fine act of obedience to the instincts of courage and chivalry, and the whole life of the country is enriched and ennobled by their example.

WE publish to-day the terms of resolutions passed by a meeting of Unitarian ministers held in Manchester on the subject of ministers and the army. Somewhat similar resolutions have also been passed by the Protestant Dissenting Deputies. We leave them for the consideration of our readers. We see no reason to alter our opinion that it is undesirable that ministers of religion should place themselves in a class apart and become judges in their own case at a time when it is recognised in the most emphatic way that it is "the general duty of every person of military age and fitness to attest under Lord Derby's scheme whatever the personal inconvenience or sacrifice may be." We also see grave danger in the idea, which seems to underlie both sets of resolutions, that the conscience of a minister is a more delicate organ or in any case must be more carefully screened from the pressure of a great public opinion than that of the layman. Is it desirable that every other calling and profession in the country should adopt a similar policy, and state publicly that in present circumstances military service is a matter simply for the lonely conscience, and that no influence or persuasion must be brought to bear in one direction or the other? Or in other words that for all men it must be made as easy to stay at home as to go? And if not, why not?

It has been suggested to us that we have caused offence in some quarters because it is held that we have been guilty of an unwarrantable interference with the liberties of the private conscience. We have simply done what it is our duty to do in dealing with matters of grave public concern. It is the function of the Press not merely to impart information but also to try to educate public opinion. Ministers are public men and they cannot withdraw their actions from the scrutiny of the platform and the Press; nor is it wise for them to claim that they are so self-sufficient that they have no need either of the prompting or support which other men find useful in grave decisions of duty. The whole matter has been argued in our columns on the high ground of general principles. Having stated our convictions, with the force and directness which a grave emergency seemed to demand, we have refrained entirely from using them as weapons against anybody. It is not our business to deal with particular cases, but we have a clear duty to state arguments and principles. If some men are offended the gratitude of others is an ample compensation. After all the resolutions to which we have referred have some object in view. They are intended to influence thought and conduct. Their words are tepid and non-committal, and will act on the whole in the direction of discouragement. Ours have been exactly the reverse, because nothing else seems to us worthy of the greatest call which has ever been made to the chivalry of our country. The duty is so urgent and so high that in it all distinctions are lost. We forget whether we are clerical or lay, and feel for the moment that our highest privilege is simply to be men. If we have roused opposition in some quarters and made a good many other men thoughtful we can at least claim to be acquitted of the crime of serving the need of the hour with weak ineffectiveness.

TIMELINESS.

THERE is something strangely familiar in the proverbial wisdom of the past. The human heart changes very little from age to age. When it is face to face with the elemental things of joy and sorrow, with duty and friendship, with the perversities of human temper or the trials and disappointments of our daily lot, it speaks the same language and finds help in the same counsels of prudence or duty. How many people beside the writer of the Book of Ecclesiastes have discovered from their own experience that there is a law of timeliness which binds every purpose under heaven—a time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; a time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance; a time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; a time to argue and a time to obey. We do not seek to justify a statement like this. We accept it as sublime commonplace and allow it to control a thousand actions of our lives. It forbids us to shout in church or to wear mourning at the marriage feast. It makes us sensitive to what is seemly, and gives to most of the ordinary interests of life a scale of relative importance; and in this way it enables us to put all things which are lawful for us at all into their proper place.

But few of us are so sensitive to the inner meaning of new occasions and strange demands as to perceive easily and at once the ban of untimeliness which they place upon many familiar habits. We are inclined to look upon them as mere episodes, which will quickly pass away, leaving everything much as it was before; and so we make a virtue of going on as usual and speak with easy confidence of what we intend to do when this casual interruption has been pushed out of the way. It is much to the credit of the heart and conscience of our country that so many people have grasped what the war really means as one of the most revolutionary events in history, more powerful to change and renew the face of the world than anything which has happened for centuries.

But to some, if we may judge from their demeanour and the echoes of their opinions and discussions which reach us, it is little more than an unwelcome intruder to be got rid of as quickly as possible. They think and plan for the future in the belief that the day of peace will find us back among the old thoughts, the old habits, the old easy-going respectabilities in politics and religion and social life. Theirs is a thrice-told-tale of tragic mistake.—“As in the days that were before the flood they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came, and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be.”

With this vision of terror before our eyes and the call for complete sacrifice in our ears it is not timely that men should be absorbed in their private affairs, or allow anxiety for the future to make them timid and half-hearted. What concern have we with houses and lands and the bright prospects of a professional career, when it is our own lives that are needed without conditions to deliver men from wrong and to win security for the future?

Neither is it the time to discuss problems of justice and virtue, balancing arguments on one side and the other which land us at last in a position of moral neutrality, where we can do nothing but look on, in miserable detachment, at the world's agony. We have allowed ourselves to live too long among theories. We have been dazzled by our own cleverness, and placed small men clad in the garb of learning upon pedestals in order that the crowd may admire them. But all the time the plain Christian has known that the Gospel is not a matter of balanced arguments. It is a programme of action. It comes with swift challenge to the conscience and the will. It bids men follow, and does not wait to hear their excuses. It has no blessing for half-hearted obedience when the heavy burden must be shouldered and the hard duty must be done. There is a time to discuss, and there is a time to obey; and the time to obey is now.

It is also the time to lay bare before the eyes of men the granite foundations upon which all civilised order and all private happiness and virtue must ultimately rest. Nothing could be more untimely at the present moment than to dwell upon the softer and more sentimental ideals of peace, or to encourage the belief that love can heal the woes of men and create an earthly paradise when it is divorced from the unbending justice of God. The effort to recover the gentler virtues of the Christian character and to place them again in the sunlight of popular esteem, has been justified. There was need to do this work in order to recall men's hearts to many a lovely trait and to recover the forgotten humanism of the Gospel. But these things shine like jewels in the texture of the New Testament, which take it all in all is the sternest book in the world. When they are taken away from their surroundings they lose half their lustre and tend to survive as feeble human sentiments with no power to reveal the character of God. For men cannot love God unless they do his will, and his will is good because it is also just, and is revealed not only in loving-kindness and tender mercies but also in judgment. Now is the time to remember justice, and the debt we owe to every obligation of honour and the plighted word, and the certainty of judgment to come.

We feel that precisely the same considerations of timeliness should be applied to questions affecting theological study and the future of the Christian ministry. Learning is capable of being used as a humble hand-maid of religion, but its position is strictly subordinate and at a time like the present this must be stated with all possible emphasis. Scholarship and philosophy may help to conserve and interpret religion, but they can never create it; and when we are told that theological students must be encouraged to remain at college because of the need of trained men after the war, we believe that professional interests and consideration for secondary things are being allowed to usurp the place of the vital interests of religion. For consider the situation in which we find ourselves. At last, through the strange happenings of these days, there is a growing volume of fresh and startling experience in the deepest and most intimate things of life, such as the world has not known for centuries; and the men with their lives before them, who will have to use it and interpret it and keep it alive long after its first impulse has died away, will learn to do so best, not by plodding along the familiar grooves of study, but by themselves entering into its agony and becoming themselves part of its sacrifice. It is, in a sense, all a question of timeliness. There is a time to sit at the feet of Gamaliel; and there is a time to take up the cross and tread the stony ways of the world, and if need be to die, because that is God's way of using us in the service of his kingdom. We speak no word of disrespect of the disciples of Gamaliel. They are admirable men, but with all their wisdom they never re-create the heart of the world. The foolishness of the knight-errants of the cross has done so again and again,—and to-day it is more timely to be a knight-errant than a student.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Alas! what boots the long laborious quest
Of moral prudence, sought through good and ill;
Of pains abstruse—to elevate the will,
And lead us on to that transcendent rest
Where every passion shall the sway attest
Of Reason, seated on her sovereign hill;
What is it but a vain and curious skill,
If sapient Germany must lie deprest,
Beneath the brutal sword? Her haughty schools Shall blush, and may not we with sorrow say—
A few strong instincts and a few plain rules,
Among the herdsmen of the Alps, have wrought
More for mankind at this unhappy day
Than all the pride of intellect and thought.

WORDSWORTH.

We praise Thee in Thy power, O God!
We praise Thee in Thy sanctity.
We praise Thee who reignest in the furthest heavens,
We praise Thee who dwellest in our inmost souls,
Our Lord and hidden Comforter.

No voice can duly proclaim Thy greatness,
No heart can comprehend Thy goodness,
O Thou Father of all our Spirits.

The longings of the spirit are inexhaustible:

Only Thou canst fill the heart.

When it is empty and aching for Thee,

Hungering and thirsting for Thy righteousness,

Thou visitest it with peace unspeakable.

With Thee there is no misery to the distressed;

But sorrow is hallowed and pain is sweetened,

And hardship is assuaged, and fear is calmed.

For, Thine own nature is blessedness,

And Thou makest Thy worshippers blessed.

Yea, blessed is Thy presence, O Lord most Holy!

Blessed is it to dwell with Thee and to know Thee,

To rest on Thee and to serve Thee.

Blessed shall the nations be, when Thy glory is recognised,

When all who love Thee unite to succour and raise the weak,

When men of all climes and colours know their union.

Meanwhile, enable us to discern and love Thy servants

Under whatever strange name or false creed they are hidden.

Strengthen us in life or death, in this and in every life,

To be Thine in fact, as we are Thine in right;

To obey cheerfully, to strive loyally,

To suffer meekly, to enjoy thankfully.

So shall we love Thee while we live, and partake of Thy joy,

And triumph over sorrow, and fulfil Thy work,

And be numbered with Thy saints, and die on Thy bosom.

F. W. NEWMAN.

ALMIGHTY and most merciful God, who never failest them that trust in thee: give us grace in all difficulties and distresses to have recourse to thee, and to rest in the assurance of thy wisdom and thy love. Thou wilt keep him, O Lord, in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee. Suffer us not to be oppressed with the cares of this life; but grant that, having done our part in all honesty and diligence, we may cheerfully commit ourselves to thy providence, casting all our cares on thee, and being strengthened to say, even in our darkest hour, Father, not our will but thine be done. AMEN.

LETTERS FROM THE BELGIAN HOSPITALS.

THE following letters chosen from those received recently illustrate the activities of the Belgian Hospital Fund from the point of view of those whom it is our privilege to help.

I.

The case of surgical instruments has just arrived. I send you my best thanks for this rich gift which you have made to the Belgian Army for my use. The surgical instruments which you have given so generously will permit us to attend properly to all urgent cases, and to do all necessary small operations. We are now placed in the position of being able to do our duty and to do it well. It is perfect. For my part I shall never forget the large and perpetually renewed generosity which you English show to us who are driven from our own dear country into a strange land, having left all behind us. I cannot show you all my gratitude but I can assure you it is deep, and, above all, very sincere.

II.

Confident in your sympathy for the sick and the wounded Belgians, I take the liberty of writing this letter. Twice already have you shown your great generosity. Once, wishing to assist the physical healing of our wounded, you gave to this hospital a valuable stock of surgical instruments. A second time, seeing the need of mental and moral assistance, you made a present to our soldiers of games, books, and magazines.

I want once more to express the gratitude which fills the heart of each one of us. I fear to abuse your kindness in making another appeal to your generosity, but I venture to tell you how we are placed here. When you so kindly visited us you must have noticed that our establishment is singularly isolated, with no distractions of any sort, except, of course, the country itself; but now winter is here, the men must stay indoors a great deal, and they suffer accordingly in spirits. We doctors consider it our duty to try to cheer them up as much as possible. The games and the books in French and Flemish which you sent serve to pass many hours; but there are 200 men, and all do not care for these. But if we could have a gramophone, and especially a small cinema (such as some families have for their own rooms), we should no longer envy the hospitals in towns where there are concerts and entertainments.

Mrs. Allen would be doing us a great service if she would allow us to beg of her to make our wants known among her generous fellow-countrymen.

III.

Very many thanks for the things which arrived safely to-day. I was most thankful to have them as I had not one shirt left, and the blankets were on the beds within half an hour of their arrival. We did so like the chintzy counterpanes—we put them in our ward. If you do happen to have any more lying by we should love to have them for our other wards downstairs. We should need twenty-five. I feel rather as if it were imposing to ask, but if you have any towels and slippers they would be a boon.

Thank you ever so much for all the things. This is an unofficial letter as you will receive one formally from the lieutenant. The games are lovely also.

IV.

I have the honour to express my sincere gratitude for the things you have had the great kindness and the charming generosity to send for our sick here (nervous cases). It was with a real satisfaction that I heard you were coming to see us in this isolated spot in Normandy. I was so happy to see you again, for never shall I forget all that you did for my typhoid patients when I was at St. P. The announcement of your visit inspired me with a hope, well founded, of being able to improve the conditions for my men. It is so sad here, and the poor fellows lack so many things.

Will you give my special thanks to Mr. Drummond for the appeal which he made for the wheel chairs, which will be of the greatest use?

V.

This new evidence of the solicitude of the Belgian Hospital Fund is to me a precious testimony of the interest which you continue to take in my depot. Day after day the improvements continue, and since your visit many things have been done. All have one object—to make our convalescents the better, morally and physically, for their stay here. You know the difficulties I have to combat; but as my colleagues are heart and soul with me, we shall, in time, achieve our desired result. We are, therefore, all the more grateful for the aid you have given us by the Belgian Hospital Fund. (In an interview later Mrs. Allen learnt that this officer was very anxious to teach the men various handicrafts and artistic occupations to while away the winter days. Sets of tools for wood carving, for poker work, embroidery even, are going out soon, together with a gramophone. Many of the men are good musicians, and a band would occupy happily many hours, but instruments are lacking. One violin and a guitar are promised. Has any one a flute, banjo, or another violin and bow, or any other suitable instrument which they will give? There are 600 men at the depot, and as they only stay a few weeks until well, regular trades cannot be taught as elsewhere; but the supply of musicians seems to be unending.)

THE CHURCHES AND THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It has been suggested that at the outbreak of war the Church should have closed its doors. This seems to some of us the only sane and logical position. It would have been a real protest against militarism, it would have left all the young clergymen free to join the army (with the exception of those who saw in their vocation something that prevented), and the remainder would have attended to the legal functions and ceremonies of religion. You assume that those who refrain from joining the universal effort to beat Germany are pacifists. Not so, those who have agonised in the social degeneration of the last twenty years recognise in this world conflagration the hand of a stern and just Providence, using drastic methods to purge away the rottenness of the nations. If danger comes near ourselves we can but do, like some brave souls did on the Titanic, die bravely. There is no doubt that the ideal action would have been to have sided with America and the other neutrals, and then made an industrial boycott of military nations. But our moral stamina was not great enough. The people would not have followed any command to deny themselves certain commodities. They needed fear and compulsion to cause them to make the sacrifice. It is too late now,—we shall have to wait another hundred years before the choice comes again.

The Church, however, that took such an attitude would (when the fever was over), have commanded a respect and allegiance which never can be ours again.—Yours, &c.

A. Y. LAWRENCE,

December 12.

[The neutrality which our correspondent advocates would have meant the breaking of treaties, the betrayal of friends, baseness, and dishonour. Such mortal wounds to the soul of civilisation are far more terrible than all the physical horrors of war. It was our moral stamina and our faith in God that made this course impossible.—[Ed. of INQUIRER].

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF FREE CHRISTIANS AND OTHER RELIGIOUS LIBERALS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The present world-wide war has put an end, for the time being, to the activities of our Congress, in which have been associated for fifteen years past, for the promotion of their common ideals and aims, the representatives of over thirty nations and a hundred different religious fellowships. Liberal religious teachers and workers who, but yesterday, were conferring and striving together amicably for the increase throughout the world of religious freedom and progress in the spirit of mutual confidence and goodwill, are to-day sundered, distrustful, and often in violent antagonism towards each other. Under such distressing conditions it becomes evident that the session of our Congress planned for the summer of 1916 must be postponed to a more favourable time, and then perhaps held in neutral territory. To not a few the continued existence of our association seems problematical. But already the signs are multiplying that in reality the conclusion of the war will call for the rehabilitation of our International Congress, and enable it to enter upon a new and higher stage of usefulness. Amid all the misunderstanding, passion and violence that attend this terrible struggle between the nations, the conviction is dawning in the souls of high-minded men and women that there are certain spiritual values which can never be destroyed by the mistakes or misfortunes of any single generation.

The pursuit of truth, the acquisition of knowledge, the practice of virtue, the enjoyment of the beautiful, the love of our fellows, the worship of God—these ideal interests, in which the glory and hope of our race so largely consist, are not subject to the idle wrath of man or the vicissitudes of a military campaign. They are eternal verities, as firmly placed in the spirit's skies as are the lights of heaven. Recent correspondence with eminent scholars and religious leaders in Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, and other warring countries, reveals that a more pacific and inclusive spirit is awakening among them. The conviction is reasserting itself that intellectual and ethical issues must again assume their rightful place as the paramount interests of human life. Learning, philosophy, science, art, culture, morals and religion—these are not ephemeral or accidental in their nature, or limited by boundaries of nationality and race; much less subject to the arbitrament of sword or cannon. They will remain for ever the common aims of the higher kind of men and women in all nations.

Therefore, when the war-drums beat no longer the beating of the heart of humanity will again be listened to; when the conflicts of the embattled nations are ended and their war-flags are furled, the white flag of universal peace will receive the grateful homage of mankind, and free-minded, large-hearted religious teachers in all countries, responding to the invitation of our International Congress, will assemble once more to renew their severed friendships, calmly and kindly to consider their mutual interests, and by united efforts advance the triumph of reason, freedom, and progress in religion, the brotherhood of man, and the peaceful federation of the world. This is our firm persuasion which we trust and pray may be shared by the members and friends of our Congress in every land, of whatever religious affiliation. We should be glad to hear from all who are in accord with our prophecy and aim, and who, when the right moment shall have arrived, will aid us in making our Association once more a world-embracing, reconciling medium between the liberal and religious thinkers and workers of our time.—Yours, &c.,

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

IDEALISM AND ORTHODOXY.

GOD AND FREEDOM IN HUMAN EXPERIENCE: THE DORNELLAN LECTURES, 1913-14. By C. F. D'Arcy, D.D., Bishop of Down. London: E. Arnold. 10s. 6d. net.

In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, idealism was remarkably fortunate in having for its expositors a succession of eloquent writers. Perhaps that is not quite the fairest way of stating the matter. The philosophy that could gather to its service so brilliant a band of exponents ought to have some of the credit. The present work by the Bishop of Down shows that the race is not yet exhausted. Why should not divine philosophy be musical as is Apollo's lute? Certainly the Bishop's fluent writing makes easy reading and should do much to recommend his views to readers, who without being students desire to know what can be said on these large questions. No one will expect absolute novelty in such subjects, but the book shows how they are open to fresh handling. Bergson, of course, is a new influence and it is interesting to see how a representative of an older school receives the impact, at a tangent, as it were, of this recent force in European thought. Nothing ever remains quite the same after so important an arrival. It is with something of a shock that we find Dr. D'Arcy finding fault with Bergson for being "led astray by the unifying tendency which beguiles all philosophers." An idealist objecting to unifying tendencies! M. Bergson has taught that finalism, the idea of a definite goal to be reached, purposiveness, does not characterise the life-impulse of the world, but belongs only to the realm of our human intellect. Dr. D'Arcy however shows that both in our conscious experience (which is more than intellect) and in the great realm of instinct (which is not, according to Bergson, a mere imperfect form of intelligence), there is purposiveness, guidance by the future, and not the mere push from behind, which is the only unity Bergson can discover in nature. Dr. D'Arcy finds much help in the conception that the universe contains widely different degrees of reality, which are arranged according to the amount of "concreteness" they possess. The most concrete of all (that is the least abstract) is spirit, or conscious experience.

All this has a bearing on orthodox theology. "Theology is always the interpretation of religion in the terms of some philosophy." A hard saying! We might agree if Dr. D'Arcy had said "in terms of the prevailing conceptions of a particular age." At any rate, the Bishop has no difficulty in fashioning from his own philosophy a foundation satisfactory to himself of the doctrines of Incarnation and Trinity. It must be said that the arguments give the impression of having been made up, though in quite good faith, to reach foregone conclusions. Where he is off these beaten tracks, however, Dr. D'Arcy makes useful comments on present-day interests, as when he speaks of the necessity of adjusting the old distinction between immanence and transcendence to the altered state of philosophic thought. "Many who rushed eagerly to seize the new idea (of immanence) failed to realise that they were exposing their theology to serious dangers." W. WHITAKER.

DOGMA, FACT, AND EXPERIENCE. By A. E. J. Rawlinson. London: Macmillan & Co., 2s. 6d. net.

MR. RAWLINSON, who contributed an able essay to "Foundations," has attempted an ambitious task in this small volume. Like most of the younger clergy who have paid serious attention to theological scholarship, he is acutely aware of many of the objections to an attitude of easy conformity. He feels his own mind working among modern conditions. He recognises the impossibility of pretending to run living thought into all the ancient moulds. But at the same time he has a deep reverence for traditional loyalties, and has accepted the obligation to teach religion through the medium of symbols and dogmas which are provided for him. Accordingly he approaches his problem, not as a philosopher who desires simply to explore the truth, but as a churchman stung by an uneasy feeling that he has to justify his position, his mode of thought, and his public use of words, both to himself and to those who listen to him. This imparts an element of vagueness and indecision to his whole treatment of the subject. He has given us not so much a theological treatise as an apology for his own position. We fear that many readers will feel, as we have done, that he shows much greater ability in stating difficulties and the implications of new positions than in constructing satisfactory lines of communication between the demands of orthodoxy and the claims of scholarly freedom. Nearly every Broad Church via media with which we are acquainted suffers from this fatal defect that it lacks the strength and consistency needful to impress intelligent men who remain outside, not because they are obstinate schismatics or lacking in Christian reverence, but simply for conscience sake. Mr. Rawlinson's chapters on 'Our Lord and the Future' and 'Clerical Veracity' hold the attention of the reader on account of the candour with which they state difficulties which are beginning to be widely felt; but their conclusions leave us with a feeling of unreality and disappointment. When we ask for the reason of this ineffectiveness, which seems to mark most attempts of liberal Anglicans to face radical problems, we can only attribute it to a refusal to deal faithfully with their own prepossessions in favour of the Prayer Book and the Creeds. No wise man will refuse to pay the respect due to these classical expressions of Christian thought and devotion. But even our classics were conceived by human minds and fashioned by human hands, and it is a false reverence which puts their claims upon our allegiance hardly lower than that of verbal inspiration. We shall remain in a sea of troubles, and no small injury will be done to religion until we agree to regard them as the fallible human documents which they really are.

IS DEATH THE END? By John Haynes Holmes, Minister of the Church of the Messiah, New York. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 6s. net.

"BEING a Statement of the Arguments for Immortality; a Justification, from the Standpoint of Modern Scientific and Philosophical Thought, of the Immortal Hope; and a Consideration of the Conditions of Immortality and their Relation to the Facts and Problems of Present Human Existence"—the long sub-title recounts the contents of this book. It is dedicated "to the radiant Memory of Robert Collyer," with whom the author was for five years associated in the ministry of his church, the last five years of a life beautiful and vigorous in old age and instinct with happy faith. In that thought we may find the keynote of the book. Its "proof of Immortality," earnestly and confidently offered, does not rest on any findings of the Society for Psychical Research, though the importance of such study is by no means minimised, the proof is found rather in conviction derived from a consideration of human nature and human experience as a whole. Due weight is given to the scientific argument as to the place of man in the order of a progressive world interpreted in the light of the doctrine of evolution, but far deeper significance is attached to the necessary inference from the moral and spiritual facts of experience in the higher ranges of personality. The position taken is that expressed in the quotation from John Fiske's 'Destiny of Man,' "I believe in the immortality of the soul as a supreme act of faith in the reasonableness of God's work"; and for himself Mr. Holmes declares that "immortality, like the greatest, deepest, and highest truths of modern science, is established by the proof of inference." That the inference is absolutely sure, he is convinced, and it is largely from the desire to share that conviction with others that his book has been written. The argument in its various aspects is clearly stated and illustrated by many quotations from modern writers, which add to the interest of the theme. Among the many references there are a few errors of name which have escaped correction. On p. 267 Capt. Lawrence Oates, who perished with Capt. Scott on his South Pole Expedition, appears as "Titus Oates" (!) and on p. 376 John Hampden as "Hampton." In the Appendix F. W. Farrar's name is given as "James." Mr. Holmes is accustomed to make the preacher's appeal, and one feels it repeatedly in the pages of his book. The supreme reality of God, the worth of life as it is realised in the individual soul, the unseen things of the spirit which are eternal, these are the foundation truths on which his appeal is based, and his confident conviction that what we call death is for us not the end.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

The Belgian Hospital Fund is one of M. Vandervelde's Union of Committees in London, and works in close co-operation with the Belgian Army Medical Authorities. Its object is to provide the Belgian Military Hospitals in France with sufficient surgical instruments, medical and nursing requisites, bed-linen, and clothes for the patients. It also aids the Convalescent Depots for Belgian soldiers, and maintains a Hospice for civilian refugees in Calais.

NONCONFORMIST MINISTERS AND THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS UNDER LORD DERBY'S SCHEME.

At a meeting of the Deputies of Protestant Dissenters, which is representative of laymen of the three denominations, Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist, held on Monday, December 6, 1915, after the reading and consideration of Lord Derby's correspondence with the Archbishop of Canterbury and of correspondence with the heads of various Nonconformist theological colleges and Members of Parliament, it was resolved: "That the Committee recognise in the most emphatic way the general duty of every person of military age and fitness to attest under Lord Derby's scheme whatever the personal inconvenience or sacrifice may be. At the same time they are of opinion that in the case of a minister in charge of a church the question whether he should offer himself for military service or not is a matter of conscience to be settled by himself after consultation with his church, or, if there is a governing body to which he is subject, with such governing body.

"In the case of theological students the Committee, while feeling the difficulty of the question, is of opinion that, having regard to the necessity of maintaining the future spiritual life of the churches and of supplying an adequate ministry, and also having regard to the small number of men affected, it would be fair and proper to apply to theological students the same exemption as has been given to medical students, namely, that those now in the last two years of their course should be treated as 'starred' men."

Resolved further: "That this resolution be communicated to Lord Derby and the Prime Minister and be made public."

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

A SPECIAL CONFERENCE of members was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday, December 9, to consider the relationship of our ministers to the war and problems connected therewith. The meeting was called at the request of the Manchester Monthly Conference of Ministers. The resolution which was adopted at the Annual Meeting on June 30 last was reaffirmed, viz., :-

"That this body of ministers deprecates any and every attempt to bring pressure, either openly or by implication, to bear upon theological students and younger ministers to divert them from their accepted tasks to military service. It desires to express the opinion that the question of duty in this matter is one that can be solved only by the individual student or minister concerned, and that there should be no discrimination in the way of respect as between those who decide in one way and those who decide in another."

The following resolution was also adopted, like the previous one without a dissentient vote :-

"That, while the Ministerial Fellowship is no director of the conscience of its members, and would resent the application of any rough-and-ready rule of judgment as to the duty of ministers generally in view of the national call to men of suitable age to enter upon military service, this meeting of members of the Fellowship sees no inconsistency in ministers of religion responding to the call at this grave crisis, as so many honourable members of their congregations have already done. While respecting the convictions of those (whether ministers or theological students), who feel that their rightful place is still at home, it bids God-speed to those who have felt it their duty to go. For these brethren it asks generous consideration from the congregations of which they have had charge, and gratefully recognises the sympathetic help already given in this way by some of the churches."

The difficulty of supplying the place of ministers who secure leave of absence for this purpose was referred to the Committee for consideration, with power to organise and take any needful action.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Clifton.—A Sale of Work, arranged by the Ladies' Working Guild in aid of the funds of Oakfield Road Church, was held in the Lecture Hall on the 10th inst., and proved a gratifying success. Mrs. Tudor Jones opened the sale, and the Treasurer, in introducing her, said that the Mother Church in Lewin's Mead was already feeling and responding to the power of Mrs. Jones's organising zeal. Mrs. Jones made a forcible appeal to all to maintain and extend their best efforts in the sphere of good, that they might thereby combat and overcome the forces of evil so greatly in evidence at the moment. A pleasing feature of the gathering was the presence of members of the Lewin's Mead Meeting, and a Japanese professor connected with the University.

Colne: Resignation.—The Rev. A. Cobden Smith has resigned the pulpit of the Stanley Street Unitarian Church, and will terminate his ministry there at the end of February. At a meeting of the congregation held last Sunday evening the resignation was accepted, and good wishes were expressed for Mr. Smith's welfare in his new sphere of labour at Holbeck, Leeds.

Evesham.—On Sunday, Dec. 12, the Rev. W. H. Drummond preached at Oat Street Chapel on behalf of the Belgian Hospital Fund. It is intended to start a sewing circle and to send regular parcels of clothing. The offertories for the day, amounting to over £8, will be used for the purchasing of material for this purpose.

Gee Cross.—Religious differences are quickly falling out of sight, and the war is welding denominations into a bond of friendship which will not be quickly broken. Churchmen, Unitarians, Primitive Methodists, and the Wesleyan Methodists of Gee Cross are to hold a united war intercessory service each month for the lads of the district who have nobly answered their country's call, and are either in training or fighting in the trenches. The first of these services was held in Holy Trinity Church on Wednesday evening, December 8th, and the congregation, which was representative, was addressed by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, whilst the vicar, the Rev. J. P. Richmond, conducted the service. It is something new to us, says The Hyde Reporter, to see a Unitarian minister preaching in a Church of England place of worship, and only goes to show the broad views of the Vicar of Holy Trinity Church in this direction. Right throughout his ministry at Gee Cross Mr. Dowson has always been pleasantly associated with the clergy of the district, as will be remembered by the part taken by the former Vicar of St. Thomas', the Rev. F. A. Screeton, along with the 'Bishop' in the settlement of the Northrop wages dispute some years ago. This last token of appreciation will only serve to strengthen the link which is gradually uniting all the churches.

On Tuesday evening a soiree, promoted by the local Free Church Council, took place in the Union Street Church Schools, when the president, the Rev. B. G. Theobald, B.A., occupied the chair, and was supported by the ministers of the local Free Churches. The Chairman referred to the desirability of manifesting Christian unity amongst churches of various denominations, and indicated ways in which union can serve to attain the objects for which the churches live. The Rev. David Brook, M.A., D.C.L., principal of the United Methodist College, Manchester, and an ex-president of the National Council, delivered a very helpful address on the subject, 'Some Good Thoughts for Bad Times,' and in view of the war counselled perspective and proportion, patience and courage in its active and passive forms, during the present troublous times. A well-attended and successful meeting was concluded by an expression of thanks to the artistes, the Rev. Dr. Brook, the chairman, and the ladies and others who had arranged for refreshments partaken during a short interval, on the motion of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, seconded by the Rev. E. Brentnall, and the singing of the National Anthem.

Huddersfield.—The members of the Fitzwilliam Street Social Union, in connection with the Unitarian Church, had the opportunity on Wednesday, December 1st, of hearing the Earl of Sandwich, K.C., V.O., deliver an address on 'Spiritual Healing,' in the course of which he gave many instances of the working of the power which he claims to possess and which he has dealt with in his recent book. The Rev. R. A. Dickson, president, was in the chair, and among those supporting him were the Vicar of Huddersfield (Canon Rolt) and Alderman E. Woodhead, J.P., the editor of The Huddersfield Examiner. The chairman spoke of the great strides which had been made in our knowledge of spiritual laws during recent years and of the help which had been rendered by men representing very diverse schools of thought. In their revealing of the presence around us of unseen but eternal forces they had reminded the world that the most abiding things were operating daily upon these strange and chequered lives of ours. The lecturer did not claim that he had any fixed theory in regard to the subject of his address, but expressed his belief that while there was a great limit to human understanding, there was no limit to divine power. The people he had treated had been of various religious persuasions, but he was convinced that there was only one tenet and one law which pervaded the whole world, and that was contained in the religion taught by Christ, "love God and love your neighbour." A discussion followed, and a vote of thanks, moved by Canon Rolt, and seconded by Alderman Woodhead, was carried with much cordiality.

London, Hackney.—The Sale of Work which was opened yesterday at Aspland Hall, adjoining the New Gravel Pit Church, and is being continued to-day, has been organised for the purpose of clearing the debt which has not yet been paid off since the Hall and reconstructed Schools were opened two years ago. The original cost was £2,254 and of this there is still a balance of £217 to meet. The Annual Report of the committee of the Sunday School gives some encouraging details about the progress made during the past twelve months. There are 240 scholars on the books, the average attendance being 178, with a group of 26 teachers. The latter are provided with copies of The Sunday School Monthly, and a weekly Teachers' Class devotes considerable time to the preparation of lessons for the following Sunday. Two courses of Fisher lectures have been given by the minister, the Rev. Bertram Lister, this year, the subjects being a second and third series on 'Historic London.' The balance from the sale of tickets for the first course was added to the school funds, but the second course was free, collections being taken for the Prince of Wales's Relief Fund. Three additional lectures in aid of the Prince of Wales's Fund, on 'Russia,' 'Our Ally: Japan,' and 'The River Lea' were given in the autumn by Dr. Soskice, Mr. Wilden-Hart and Mr. J. Cox respectively. The monthly Children's Services, the Recreation Class, Band of Hope and Mercy, Gymnasium Class and Drilling Class also continue their useful work. The generosity of those who, by giving time and money, enabled Aspland Hall to be erected, has borne much fruit during the past year. The hall is in use almost every night of each week, and it is felt that it has very materially assisted in the bettering of the work throughout the school. The prospects of the latter are most hopeful. Its influence has extended so much that it is not possible to admit any more scholars, but the committee feel that if its efficiency is judged by the average attendance, and by the number of meetings held and new institutions opened, they can look forward to a future of increased usefulness and effort.

London, Islington.—The Rev. J. Vint Laughland delivered an interesting address on "The Decreasing Birth Rate and Infant Mortality" to the members of the Unity Church branch of the Women's League on Dec. 7, in the course of which he gave some startling facts and statistics, and laid emphasis on the fact that poverty and all that goes with it is undoubtedly the main cause of infantile mortality. The late Dr. Drysdale, of the Metropolitan Free Hospital, stated some years ago that the death-rate of infants among the rich was not more than 8 per cent., while among the very poor it was often as high as 40 per cent. Chronic under-feeding and bad feeding reaped a terrible harvest of infant lives, though, in spite of the fact that overcrowding and bad housing was as common, if not more so, among the poorest Jews as among the poorest Irish and Italians, their infant mortality was much lower, because the children were better fed. England, said Mr. Laughland, depended on her infants for the future, and they must succeed not only in reducing the infantile death-rate to the minimum, but also in ensuring healthy survivals, if England's greatness among the nations of the earth was to be increased and conserved.

Manchester: Blackley.—By the death of Mrs. Mary Simister, The Thorn, Polygon Road, Crumpsall, the Blackley Unitarians have lost a valued supporter. She was a faithful member of the church, which she regularly attended from childhood. At all times she would come forward to assist the various organisations connected with the church and the school, and an appeal to her for a needy cause was never in vain. For some time the deceased lady was president of the ladies' sewing society, and has also been school superintendent and teacher for many years. She was a real Christian woman. The funeral took place on Tuesday, Dec. 7, when the officiating ministers were the Rev. W. Holmshaw, Ilminster, and Rev. D. R. Davies. Wreaths were sent by the congregation, school, the ladies' sewing society, and many friends.

Manchester: Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—A Sale of Work held last week realised about £140. Miss E. M. Greg, of Styal, presided on the first day, and the sale was opened by Mrs. W. R. Stevenson of Sheffield. On the second day, in place of a formal opening, the children of the congregation gave scenes from Kingsley's "Water Babies." Mr. Peach has recently given a series of Sunday evening addresses on the four great tragedies, viz., Job, Lear, Faust, and Brand.

National Conference Guilds' Union and the War.—It is interesting to note that of the Unitarian ministers who have enlisted about half the number are connected with the National Conference Guilds' Union. The Rev. Mortimer Rowe is secretary for Topic List and Essay Scheme; the Revs. E. Glyn Evans and W. G. Price are members of the Council, and the Revs. Walter and J. Horace Short are founders of Guilds at Bootle and Blackpool respectively. In addition it may be mentioned that the Rev. C. M. Wright, a former secretary of the Union, offered himself for enlistment, but on grounds of physical unfitness was not accepted; further that Mr. H. Whitaker, a recent member of the Council, secretary of the Mossley Guild and an effective lay preacher, is a member of the R.A.M.C.

Nelson.—On Sunday last, Dec. 12, Anniversary Services were conducted, in the morning by Mr. W. Shackleton, in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. Herbert Barnes, of Manchester, with satisfactory attendances and average collections. Week-night lectures have been delivered by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith recently on "Charles Dickens" and "David Copperfield," with Mr. D. Rushton, Town Librarian, as chairman, and on "Napoleon and Waterloo," with the Rev. D. L. Nichol, Congregational Minister, presiding, and they were well attended. Mr. Smith has addressed an adult class at a Baptist Sunday School, and is now invited and engaged for an Adult Class at another Baptist Sunday School, on "Why am I a Unitarian?" A Young People's Guild and a Band of Hope have been started.

Norwich.—On Sunday morning Dec. 12, the Norwich Division of the Red Cross visited the Octagon Chapel on Church Parade. The body of the chapel was filled with men in uniform, and the service was taken by the Rev. Lawrence Redfern, M.A., B.D., who is a member of the Red Cross Division. In the course of his sermon, Mr. Redfern remarked that it was not wholly inappropriate that a Unitarian Church in whose traditions Florence Nightingale was nurtured, should have the privilege of welcoming a division of the Red Cross Society which she forestalled, or rather, she implanted the seed which that Society had tended and watered and brought to a full fruition. When we read of the grim struggles of the present war, it would seem that, while everything that is necessary for the maintenance of life is increasing in value, there is nothing so cheap as human life. But there is another side to the picture represented by the Red Cross Organisation. Infinite care and patience and love are bestowed upon the sick and the maimed, and there comes to us the irresistible conviction that sympathy is not going to vanish from the world, nor will mercy, righteousness, and pity decline and pass away. When we think of the multiplicity of institutions organised under the Red Cross banner for the alleviation of pain and suffering, of the amount of ground they cover, and the quiet, earnest way in which they are administered, it would seem as if there were more applied religion in the world just now than we sometimes imagine, a greater measure of quiet "doing of the will" than there is of conscious knowledge of the doctrine. It is the religion, not of the cloister, but of the hearth and the open road, the religion that throws wide the door that opens on the crowded highway of the world's great needs, and goes forth to practise eagerly the gospel of good works. The collection at the close of service was devoted to the funds of the Red Cross Division.

Oxford.—It is with great regret that it has been found necessary owing to lack of workers to close the Charles Street Institute, which has been carried on in a poor neighbourhood for the last twenty years under the superintendence first of Miss J. Upton and later of Miss Ellen Drummond. The only branch of the work to be continued is the Provident Bank which Miss Jennings has kindly undertaken to carry on independently.

The Boys' Own Brigade.—The Executive Committee of the Liverpool Battalion have issued their Annual Report for the twelve months ending September 30, 1915. The activities of the four companies have been somewhat curtailed owing to the absence on the field of action of most of the officers and staff sergeants, but the few forced to remain at home have worked hard and loyally and have kept their respective companies together. Camp was found to be impossible this year, but Battalion Sports were held very successfully, and the good training of the boys showed in their thoroughly sportsmanlike behaviour. The bands have done useful work in distributing recruiting circulars during the year. Special congratulations are given to the 8th Company (Hamilton Road) for taking part in a Drill Competition and in Sports promoted by the Liverpool Union of Boys' Clubs. These events were of particular interest as the other competitors were drawn from the Boys' Brigade, the Catholic Boys' Brigade, the Jews' Lads Brigade and the Scouts, and it is the first time these various organisations have been brought together in any way in Liverpool. The Roll of Honour of members of the Liverpool Battalion serving with the Navy and Army includes the names of 13 officers, 8 staff sergeants and 7 boys, while the Roll of old members includes 1 officer, 3 staff sergeants and 21 boys. Many of these have made good use of signalling and ambulance qualifications learned whilst in the B.O.B.

Walsall.—In order to raise a sum of money to pay off a deficit on the chapel accounts caused by expenditure on repairs, a Sale of Work was held in the Schoolroom on Tuesday last. It was opened by the Mayoress of Walsall, Mr. James Davies, a Baptist layman, presiding. The Rev. W. T. Kershaw (Baptist) and the Rev. J. Mainwaring (Primitive Methodist) were also present. It was announced that gifts of money or goods had been received from branches of the Women's League at Coseley, Coventry, Pontypridd, Stalybridge, and Stourbridge. The total proceeds, including donations, amounted to just over £60, a sum which will be quite sufficient for present needs.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

CHURCH ATTENDANCE AT HARVARD COLLEGE.

Regret was recently expressed in an editorial comment in The Christian Register that the "voluntary" attendance at daily services at Harvard was so small, and it was implied that this lamentable falling off was the result of the fact that for some years the students have not been "required" to be present at these services—"a concession to the secularism of the times." The Rev. Henry Wilder Foote, Professor in the Harvard Divinity School and Secretary of the Faculty, has written in reply, defending the change which was made in 1886 as "a testimony to faith in religious liberty," and pointing out that chapel attendance is steadily increasing. As President Eliot wrote in 1887, "there are, of course, students who never enter Appleton Chapel, or expose themselves in any way to the preachers' influence, but in this respect the college closely resembles the larger community without." Little more than five years ago the Sunday service in Appleton Chapel was changed from 8 P.M. to 11 A.M. The result has been a great increase in the general congregation, the student attendance now averaging at least three times more than it did at the evening services. During the same five-year period there has been a rise of 20 per cent. in student attendance at morning prayers.

A NEW HONOUR FOR LAFCADIO HEARN.

To the Western mind there is something very fantastic in the announcement recently made in the press that during the gorgeous Japanese Coronation ceremonies, which were celebrated a fortnight ago amidst the hills and pine-woods of Kyoto, a dead scholar was honoured by "the bestowal of the junior grade of fourth Court rank upon the shade of Lafcadio Hearn." Yet the profound gratitude of the Japanese people to one who entered into their life and interpreted it to the world with singular charm and complete sympathy is expressed in this act of homage, and Hearn himself, though Court rank would have meant nothing at all to him, would have been the last to criticise it as a piece of superstition. With the aid of Herbert Spencer, whose teaching, paradoxical though it may seem, actually led him to defend certain beliefs which modern science has done its best to discredit, he grasped the real meaning of ancestor-worship as few modern minds have done, and it was his great regret that more "civilised" nations, as they thought themselves to be, were not more disciplined in loyalty; and imbued with the moral habit derived from this ancient cult.

THE ANIMALS' GUARDIAN.

The Animals' Guardian for December is an attractive Christmas number, suitably illustrated, and containing, as a supplement, four prize essays by school-mistresses on "How shall we teach our children humanity?" These essays give some helpful hints which will be appreciated by many who are not quite certain as to the best way of instructing young people on this subject. For a frontispiece there is a reproduction in colour of a picture, by Robert Morley, representing an old cottager sitting with her faithful collie at her lonely fireside, entitled, "The Shepherd's Widow," copies of which, mounted on a card suitable for framing, may be had for sixpence. This picture is also included in the 'Animal Lovers' Calendar,' which has a more topical but less charming design on the cover of a bull-dog in a framework of flags of the Allies. The "bull-dog breed" type of picture has been rather overdone, and it has no special appeal, we imagine, for readers of a journal that deals, not with patriotic subjects as such, but with the particular aims and activities of humane people in regard to the treatment and protection of our four-footed friends. The price of the Animals' Guardian is only 1d., and it is well worth buying for the sake of the children.

PARADISE PLUMES.

In the midst of the world-tumult of war the cause of the birds is not quite forgotten. We are glad to know that further and more stringent measures have been taken for the protection of birds in Dutch New Guinea, which has been the main source of supply for birds of paradise and crowned pigeons. The following particulars of the new regulations enacted by the Resident have been supplied to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds:—1. For this year (and most probably for the future also), shooting is limited to three species, namely: Paradisaea minor, Seleucidus nigricans, and Ptilornia magnificus. The exportation of all other bird skins is prohibited. 2. Shooting is entirely forbidden on the islands of the Radja-Ampat Group (Misole, Batante, Waigiu, &c.), on the islands of the Geelvink Bay (Jappen, Schouten Island, &c.), and on two parts of New Guinea constituting large triangles situate on both sides of Geelvink Bay. The island of Waigiu is the only home of the red Bird of Paradise, threatened with extermination by the plume-hunters; and the shores of Geelvink Bay have of late been one of the principal hunting-grounds of the trade. This notable step is a first result of the commission formed by the Royal Zoological Society of Amsterdam.

A BENEFACTOR OF LONDON CHARITIES.

The late Mr. Zachary Merton, whose death occurred a week or so ago, was a generous supporter of London charities. He never missed any opportunity of unostentatiously helping cases of distress, especially such as were caused by the pressure of "improvements" which benefit some and ruin others. Since the war began he has contributed to the Charity Organisation Society £40 a week to meet cases of poverty caused indirectly by the war. His chief interest, however, for a number of years was the training of poor boys, and he was the founder of a trade school, or institute, which was first located in St. George's Road, Holloway, and afterwards in larger premises in Holloway Road. The Evening Play Centres movement had in him a generous supporter, and for several years he subscribed an annual sum of about £750 a year, which practically paid the cost of three Centres. Mr. Merton was of Jewish race, his father being a naturalised British subject of German descent.

FAMOUS WOMEN OF AMERICA.

The first five women's names to be inscribed on the big bronze tablets of the Hall of Fame attached to New York University are Frances E. Willard, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Emma Willard, Mary Lyon, and Maria Mitchell. A large number of other famous women have been nominated, and will doubtless be elected to take their place on the national roll of honour according to a system which ensures that the highest intelligence in every state of the Union will play its part in the final selection. The idea of a Hall of Fame, The Christian Register explains, was conceived by the Rev. Dr. Henry Mitchell MacCracken, then Chancellor of the University, in 1900. He interested Helen Miller Gould (Mrs. Finley Shephard) in the scheme, and she gave practical support to the extent of $250,000. Famous men were at first the only nominees, but afterwards, in response to a widely-expressed desire for the recognition of women, an adjoining site was set apart for women as an integral part of the Hall of Fame. The foundation of this building, which is not yet completed, was begun in 1912. There is to be a museum on the ground floor, and a main colonnade above with twenty-eight columns supporting a pedimented roof, and places for the names of at least fifty famous American women

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

To all our readers we send the Christmas greeting of peace, the peace which comes when we do justly and love mercy and the heart is stayed upon God. We hope that this message will reach many sad and perplexed lives at home. Though they walk in darkness theirs may still be the confidence of the children of light. We send it too with full hearts to the men in the camps and the trenches, and to the sick and wounded in hospital, our sons and brothers, who have offered their lives for us and for the liberty of their country. It is a humbling thought for many of us, who are compelled to stay at home, that we must accept so much from them. We can never even attempt to repay it. Some gifts are infinite in the obligations they confer. But we can hold them in our hearts and try to be worthy of their sacrifice.

We must also send a message of cheer to our friends in the Belgian hospitals, who have been our care for so many months. We are proud to call them friends, for our lives are ennobled by their bravery. They have borne pain and loneliness and the loss of home and country without flinching. We are glad that they trust us as they do, and allow us to give them some of the friendship and the practical help which they so sorely lack. The contributors to our Fund, as they gather round the Christmas fire, may be happy in this thought that lives have been saved, and grievous sickness has been cured, and the medicine of cheerfulness and sympathy has been dispensed with a lavish hand. The work has been an outlet for our religion and the strong craving of the Christian heart to come close to the suffering of other men and to do something to help by bearing it with them.

SIR JOHN FRENCH, on laying down his command in France, has sent an inspiring message of farewell to the troops. After expressing his heartfelt sorrow in parting from them before the campaign has been brought to a victorious conclusion, he continues:—

I have, however, the firmest conviction that such a glorious ending to their splendid and heroic efforts is not far distant, and I shall watch their progress towards this final goal with intense interest, but in the most confident hope.

The success so far attained has been due to the indomitable spirit, dogged tenacity which knows no defeat, and the heroic courage so abundantly displayed by the rank and file of the splendid Army which it will ever remain the pride and glory of my life to have commanded during over sixteen months of incessant fighting.

Regulars and Territorials, Old Army and New Army, have ever shown these magnificent qualities in equal degree. From my heart I thank them all.

THESE confident words are a wholesome antidote to the spirit of grumbling and criticism, which still continues its mischievous work in many quarters. Sir John French speaks with an intimate knowledge of the causes of past failures and the difficulties which still lie ahead. Sensible people will go on in a mood of sober encouragement and pay little heed to the small band of noisy critics in the House of Commons. The sounding-board provided for them by a section of the press enables them to catch the public ear to a much larger extent than they deserve. It is the same names which appear again and again, asking untimely questions or indulging in dark hints of incompetence or coming disaster, and they are the names of insignificant men, who have never shown any special ability for the tasks of government. The House of Commons has a tradition of tolerance for these guerilla tactics on the part of men of no importance, and generally accepts them with good humour. It is part of the toll which it pays for its faith in the virtue of unhindered discussion. At the present time, however, people of this sort are not wanted to give comic relief to our public life. They simply minister to the perverse instinct in human nature, which never hears a suspicion without concluding that there must be something in it and finds a strange relish in searching for scapegoats and victims.

PEOPLE of this sort will no doubt spend their time in grumbling about the shortage of munitions in the early days of the war instead of praising the splendid success of our present arrangements described in Mr. Lloyd George's speech on Monday night. We have heard quite enough of the unpreparedness of our army to meet the fighting machine of Germany. If we too had lived chiefly for war we might have been more evenly matched, but we might also have lost our soul as Germany has done. It has taken time to turn an essentially peace-loving nation into an armed camp. Nothing but a terrible menace to our freedom and the spectacle of outrage and injustice running riot in the world could have done it. There are deeper reasons than indolence or indifference for our inability to meet Germany at once with military preparations equal to her own; but even so we have done great things. We have kept her at bay and shattered her promise of success; and now we are at the beginning of our big effort.

THERE was a note of warning in Mr. Lloyd George's speech, which may be interpreted as a stimulus for the future rather than as a complaint of any real lack of foresight at the present moment. What has been accomplished in the workshops is marvellous, but there must be no disposition to think that we are doing enough. More and more skilled workers are needed, and the shortage must be made good by diluting the skilled trades with ordinary labour. Here the demand of the nation comes into conflict with the regulations of the trade unions, and patriotism can have but one answer. The restrictions must be broken down wherever there is a clear case for doing so, and that without weeks of bargaining and delay, for delay means the sacrifice of hundreds of precious human lives. "It all depends upon organised labour. Unless they allow us to place unskilled men and women on work which has hitherto been the monopoly of skilled workmen, you cannot do it." This is Mr. Lloyd George's warning. It is the conflict between professionalism and patriotism which is going on all along the line. If the Trade Unions are sensible he has no doubt of the result. Germany can be beaten in English workshops. "The superficial facts of the war are for the moment against us. All the fundamental facts are in our favour." In other words, the issue is in our own hands. We can win if we put all our energy into the task. There could not be a more heartening message for the men of a strong race.

WE have steadily resisted every attempt to gloss over the crimes of Germany. We are not among those who regard the war as an interruption to friendships which will be resumed without much difficulty when peace is restored. Treachery and dishonour are capital crimes against civilisation. To clasp hands before there has been repentance and reparation is impossible. We cannot trust until there are adequate grounds for trustfulness. In these circumstances it is a matter for sincere gratitude that there are spheres of work which have not been blighted by this dark shadow of suspicion. Striking testimony has recently been borne to the good faith and noble religious character of many German missionaries in India. At the annual meeting of the National Missionary Council, which was held last month near Bombay, an important resolution on the subject was passed. Professor J. H. Moulton, who was present, has written to the Manchester Guardian to point out that the Council consists of a group of exceptionally responsible men of character and ability. Referring to the charge that German missionaries have used their office as an opportunity for political propaganda, he says that while the Missionary Council does not dream of asserting that there have never been instances of this kind of action, its members agree that in general these men and women are really Christians first and Germans after.

THE resolution to which we refer is in the following terms:—

The National Missionary Council desires to place on record an expression of its deep thankfulness to God for the disinterested and self-denying labours of German missionaries in India, to which we owe the establishment not only of the existing German but also of some of the most flourishing British missions. The Council is convinced that their labours have throughout been inspired by devotion to Jesus Christ, and directed to the spiritual elevation of the people of India. The Council regrets and would wholly dissociate itself from those imputations of ulterior political motives which have been so freely made against them. The Council recognises the grave difficulty of the situation created by the war, and gratefully appreciates the sympathetic consideration which has characterised the attitude of the Government in dealing with it. At the same time, the Council deeply regrets that the labours of the missionaries have inevitably been interrupted, and sympathises with them in their present separation from the work which they love. Further, the Council deplores that the exigencies of the war have led to the interruption of that fellowship between German and other missionaries which was enjoyed before its commencement, and earnestly hopes that on the conclusion of peace, in the good providence of God, conditions may be such as to make possible the resumption of this happy co-operation in the task of extending Christ's kingdom. In such co-operation lies one great hope of accomplishing the complete reconciliation of the nations now so widely sundered.

It is with deep regret that we have to record the death last Saturday of Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe. Among our own readers there will be a sense of personal loss mingled with the more public sorrow. The names which he bore, Enfield and Roscoe, have long been conspicuous in our annals for literary gifts and large-hearted philanthropy. He has added to their lustre by his brilliant career as a man of science and his eminent services to the nation. He was not only one of the master-minds who created the modern type of university; he was also the pioneer in the application of chemistry to manufacture, which is at last beginning to revolutionise English industry. For long his voice was that of one crying in the wilderness. He warned us that until we conquered our insular prejudices and sent our trained chemists into commercial life, Germany would go on capturing our trade. He lived long enough to see many of his prophecies come true, and also to witness a tardy resolve on our part to repair the errors of the past.

IN the course of an appreciation of his old colleague and friend, which appeared in The Manchester Guardian on Monday, Sir A. W. Ward writes as follows of his dominating influence in the reform and extension of Owen's College and of his personal qualities:—

The extension of the Owen's College, of which the Victoria University was a necessary consequence, and in this instance a quite conscious development, was accomplished by the commanding and controlling power of Thomas Ashton; but the conception was Roscoe's, and he was, intellectually, the master-builder of the first Northern University and the originator of an educational movement which most assuredly is still in progress. . . . Those who remember Roscoe in the seventies or thereabouts—as the ardent votary of science and as one of its recognised apostles, as the friend and equal of its chiefs abroad and at home, and at the same time as the indefatigable teacher in lecture-room and laboratory, where no early morning failed to find him in his crowded theatre, and as often the evening lecturer to vast audiences furnished by the teeming population of Manchester and its district—recall the presence of a man on the like of whom, for splendid energy, for high purpose, and for unchangeable good fellowship, they do not think they will look again. And some of them will also let their recollection go back to the influences by which he was surrounded and made happy in his hospitable home, and will above all think of one who in happiness and sorrow was the high-minded and true-hearted helpmate of one of the most loveable of men.

THE BLESSINGS OF CHRISTMAS.

MANY people are probably conscious of some hesitation about the mood in which they should keep Christmas this year. Most of the time-honoured festivities seem out of place. Their hearts are heavy and anxious. If their own homes are still secure in their tranquillity they cannot throw off the heavy burden of the sorrow of the world. There is also the feeling of sharp discord between the realities of the battlefield and the symbols of gladness and peace which we associate with the birth of Jesus Christ. We doubt, however, whether any of us will deliberately try to forget that it is Christmas Day. We shall listen once again to the angels' song and the story of the little child in the manger, and open our hearts to the good tidings of great joy, while the memories of home and kindred, of our own childhood and the past out of which we have come will visit us, as they have often done before, and make us conscious of dim, forgotten things, of the divine purpose which gave us birth, of the power which holds us in life, of the mystery of love to which we go.

And it is right that it should be so; for these things are still beautiful and good. Nothing can injure their sacredness or rob them of their appeal, though our own feet may stumble in the dark ways of the world and violent men drink the cup of fury to the dregs. We do not want to teach any doctrine of escape, as though we could suddenly slam the door upon these scenes of suffering and tumult and find ourselves in some paradise of pleasant dreams, even though our dreams may be of God. We must not crave for any blissful slumber of the spirit because the waking world has become intolerable. No one can be religious on these terms for long. Unless the God of our prayers is also the God of our duties we cannot offer him the worship of obedience. The shrine of peace in our hearts and the scenes of daily conflict alike belong to the real world in which God has placed us. The things which we remember in tranquillity need all the testing hours of a complete human experience before we can be sure that they are immortal. If Jesus Christ has any meaning for our souls the sufferings of this present time will only increase our gladness in remembering him. It is just where his touch is most intimate upon our lives that he is the same, yesterday, to-day and for ever.

But it is natural that our thanksgiving for Christmas should take some colouring from our present mood. To allow it to do so is only to enrich its meaning. There may be less careless rapture in it than in former years, less happy contentment with what is mirthful and gay, and just for that reason a fuller sense of what Christianity means in its completeness for the world and for ourselves. When we thank God for the birth of Christ we include not only the fragrant poetry of his infancy but the whole range of his influence, his teaching and example, all that he said, all that he was, the healing power of his sorrows, the charity of his cross, the triumph of life over death in which those who suffer with him may share. Christianity is no idyll of innocence and gentleness. It is a disclosure of the way in which men may pass through the chequered experience of life and finally meet the darkness of death and in all things be more than conquerors. The more severely we are buffeted, the sterner our fight with the powers of evil in our hearts and in the world, the more we are able to rejoice in the tender mercy of God, who causes the light to shine for us in the darkness and guides our feet by strange paths into the way of peace. Suffering brings us into the presence of our Deliverer. The emptiness and desolation of death make us certain of immortality. All these lives that go down into silence, they are not blown as barren dust about the world; they live for ever with God.

Let us then weave into our Christmas garland of thanksgiving whatever blessings of riper experience or clearer insight another year of warfare and suffering have brought to us. Some of us may have learned lessons of detachment from money and worldly ambitions and so have become more simple-minded and unselfish. Some of us may have had to fight in the loneliness of our own souls the temptations of cowardice and a mean spirit and grown strong through self-conquest. To some the message of the hour may have come in the sharp discipline of wounds or sickness, or the shadow of bereavement in their own homes, and the heart has become mellow through the things which it has suffered. And to all of us there have been given boundless opportunities of sympathy and kindness. We have felt that we are needed to help and serve our fellowmen in a larger and stronger way than we have ever done before; and few indeed among those who have any desire to do good are not better for this experience. These things may add a richer note of thankfulness to our customary Christmas joy. They have come to us in strange ways which we should not have chosen for ourselves; but they are divine, for in them God makes himself known, and gives himself to us in comfort and power. They are all touched with the unfading glory of Christ.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE LORD OF LOVE.

BEGINNE from first where he encradled was
In simple cratch, wrapt in a wad of hay,
Betweene the toylefull Oxe and humble
Asse,
And in what rags, and in how base array,
The glory of our heavenly riches lay,
When him the silly Shepheards came to see,
Whom greatest Princes sought on lowest knee.

From thence reade on the storie of his life,
His humble carriage, his unfaulty wayes,
His cancred foes, his fights, his toyle, his strife,
His paines, his povertie, his sharpe assayes,
Through which he past his miserable dayes,
Offending none, and doing good to all,
Yet being malist both of great and small.

And looke at last, how of most wretched wights
He taken was, betrayd, and false accused;
How with most scornfull taunts and fell despights,
He was revyld, disgrast, and foule abused;
How scourgd, how crownd, how buffeted,
how brused;

And lastly, how 'twixt robbers crucifyde,
With bitter wounds through hands,
through feet, through syde!....

With sence whereof, whilst so thy softened spirit

Is inly toucht, and humbled with meek zeale

Through meditation of his endlesse merit, Lift up thy mind to th'Author of thy weale,

And to his souveraine mercie doe appeale;
Learne him to love that loved thee so deare,

And in thy brest his blessed image beare....

Then shall thy ravisht soule inspired bee
With heavenly thoughts farre above humane skil,

And thy bright radiant eyes shall plainly see

Th' Idee of his pure glorie present still Before thy face, that all thy spirits shall fill

With sweet enagement of celestial love Kindled through sight of those faire things above.

SPENSER.

THE SUPREMACY OF GOODNESS.

IN its action on the world, Christianity, in its design and tendency, may be called the restoration of goodness;—its restoration to its true place among the objects of human honour and interest, its restoration as a power of wide and real influence in the future education of mankind, in building up character, in redeeming men from unhappiness and ruin. It was a great effort in behalf of goodness, as Rome was a great effort for power, and Greece a great effort for philosophy. Goodness, in the teaching of Christianity, was no vague, sentimental shadow of excellence. It had a very strongly marked pattern and standard, the life and mind and self-sacrificing love of the Son of God..... We may all of us, by God's unspeakable blessing and help, add to the world's goodness, if we cannot add to its knowledge. We may, one and all of us, the least as well as the highest, do our part in that which is the chief work of God's rule and discipline over us now, the growth and victory of the spirit and mind of Christ. We may all of us have laid our single and perhaps unnoticed stone where the fabric of God's kingdom is slowly rising, while He patiently but certainly fulfils His purposes. We may leave, when we go, no name and no remembrance. But it rests with everyone whether he shall leave what is better than name and remembrance. When He who gave us our life calls for it again, we can leave, as an offering on the altar of the God of our souls, the God of all the worlds, the offering of a life, lived in His light, ruled by His charity, humbly and thankfully resigned when it is time to give it up; a life, rescued by repentance and self-discipline from folly and sin, from sloth and emptiness; a life of duty, loyal and industrious, sincere and patient; a life in which we sought by His help to draw near to His goodness to love and to follow it, as its glory is shown to man in the face of Jesus Christ.

DEAN CHURCH.

O GOD who, in the birth of thy Son, Jesus Christ, hast bestowed upon the world a new inspiration of pure love and compassion: grant that we, who are so often turned aside from brotherly love, may, by thy light shed forth in our souls, be filled with thine own goodness; that we may be made one with each other, as children of the same Father in heaven, in the spirit of divine charity and peace. AMEN.

VERSE.

PEACE.

SOME say there is no Peace this Christmastide,
Nay, rather, lift the latch and open wide,
That He, the Prince of Peace, may enter there
Where sorrow sits, and anxious-minded care;
Then, straightway, the sad heart looks up, and sings,
And the New Year brings healing on its wings.

M. W.

IN MEMORIAM.

DID we not know him, pulse of our own blood,
A happy lad who loved the love of right,
And revelled in the warmth of joy and
light,
Responsive ever to the call of good.

Music gave utterance to his noblest mood;
His songs were songs of valour, and the might
Of heroes struggling thro' misfortune's night
Into the tide of victory at full flood.

Though Belgium claims his body, earth to earth,

His spirit lives in England, and is ours
To keep us faithful 'gainst inhuman powers

Until the end; until that great re-birth
When Justice re-establishes her worth,

And Love can plant her soldier's grave with flowers.

J. L. HAIGH.

TWO THINGS, AND A THIRD.

[Written after reading a letter on 'The Churches and the War' in THE INQUIRER of December 18th.]

Two things my soul could envy, Letch-worth friend,

If something other were not meant for mine.

One is the courage that, with least of thought,

Leaps forward at the challenge of the foe,

And, with the vigour of earth's brutal prime,

Finds joy in fierce delivery of arms, Smiting, remorseless, daring death for triumph!

The second is the mind that can retreat From beasts of prey that roam the planet still,

From violent might in league with boundless greed,

From shattered ruins of sweet human homes,

Into the stronghold of a peaceful breast Sure of one's own mild purpose and desire,

Oblivious of the wolf beside the door.

If something other were not meant for
mine,

These could I envy. But a thing supreme

Calls me through uttermost thought to follow on,

Through uttermost woe—until that end is won,

Of Law knit firm with Strength; a world of Men

(The beast within them tamed to humankind)

In manly compact and in fearless trust Allied. Toward this my soul is called,

and I,
Being nor brute nor mystic all, obey.

LONDONER.

THE LITTLE PEOPLE.

MADAME DE STAËL asked if she believed in ghosts, said she did not, but still, was afraid of them. Many who do not believe in fairies are still interested in them. No one fears them now. They once played a very prominent part in the peasant and the huntsman's way of thinking and way of living; but from our saner, though in many respects more savage existence, they have been crowded out. They, however, still haunt the student's cell. A mirage will never fill our ports with grain, however numerous its aerial argosies, but yet remains a worthy subject of scientific investigation. And fairies may never cause the slightest good or the slightest harm, but as objects of thought they have filled volumes of research and engaged companies of ingenious collectors of myth and legend. The work of collecting tales about them seems now fairly complete, but apart from the belief of every people in every age, what are the folk of faery? It is this we want most to know, and it is this want our wise men leave most unsatisfied. They might retort that their science is on a par with other sciences, with magnetism, with electricity, with light, with heat. These things also we only know as manifestations of something mysterious and unknown, but what that something is, is not known at all.

When an admirer stood with Burne-Jones before his picture of the 'Star of Bethlehem,' he asked the painter whether he believed the story to be true, and the artist sincerely replied, "It is too beautiful not to be true." That is just what one feels about the "good people," the denizens of fairy-land. That the forest glades when silvered by the moonlight beams are not abandoned and forlorn; that when the hills are aglow with the transfiguring touch of dawn, though all dwellers in the vale may lie asleep, some beings are awake to clap their hands with joy; that the harebells have other visitants than the passionless humblebees; that myrmidons of mirth play hide and seek in the foxglove blooms; that when the holts are flushed with May, soft music steals through every wood and coppice; that a dancing multitude whose footsteps never crush a spear of grass make festival to hail the home-coming of the swallow and the nightingale; that around the cradle of a sleeping child a galaxy of gracious sprites keep watch with eyes as tender as the mother's prayers; that Nature has her shining hosts to do her bountiful will; that Love has his ministers to range the world and bind with golden chains the whole round earth about the feet of God—all this is too beautiful not to be true.

Not merely fancifully and poetically true. We smile at Barrie's fun as to how fairies began. "When the first baby laughed for the first time its laugh broke into a thousand pieces, and they all went skipping about, and that was the beginning of fairies." Is it as really true that there are fairies, as it is true, in Dolly's words, that "chocolate pigs is nice," or that two and two make four?

We know, of course, that people are constantly seeing and hearing them. But what makes them see and hear them? Or what is it that they see and hear? W. B. Yeats relates how he once watched a quantity of little people dancing to a strange tune. A very beautiful tall woman, whom he calls their queen, came out to him, and he asked her whether she and her people were not "dramatisations of our moods." The fairy queen did not understand such terms. She simply replied that her people were very much like human beings, and did most of the things which human beings do. He asked her other questions as to her nature and her purpose in the universe, and she practically told him to go and mind his own business. His impression was that fairies do not interfere in human affairs, and do not wish to be interfered with.

Yet there are stories that on occasions they do interfere. For example, they help to win battles. About two thousand three hundred years ago the Greek States suffered at the hands of Persian invaders what Belgium and Servia have suffered in recent times at the hands of ruthless German hordes. When the brave Greeks were almost annihilated by the vast numbers of the invading foe there were seen intervening between the two armies an array of shining warriors who drove back the aggressors, and helped to save Greece for Europe. In our own days tales have become current of the intervention at Mons of some mysterious beings who rallied the retreating British troops and helped to break the tide of the German invasion. The Greeks declared that the gods of Greece had lent their aid, and the Christian soldiers of the Allies speak of the "angels" at Mons. How do the mythologists explain? The phenomenon, they suggest, was a collective subjective hallucination created by the desperate mental condition of the harassed troops, strong enough to be imposed on the brains of the invading soldiers, who explained their falling back as due to seeing large reinforcements coming to aid their antagonists.

When the mythologist defines a god as a "projection of the collective emotion of a group," he is insisting on the indisputable part played by human energy, by creative imagination, by the formative faculty in the making of an object of faith or belief. Man helps to create the Gods after his own image. When his belief in them wanes the majesty of the gods shrinks and fairies are merely obsolete and dwindled gods. An age of fear and superstition creates malignant demons, but where gladness in the bounties of nature abounds, where social fellowship makes life a happy song, benignant fairies and mirthful gods receive the homage of men. Even an intense personal emotion yields this moulding, informing power.

When I gaze on a Rose

I see a little face,

Dimpled chin,

Laughing eyes

So full of winsome grace.

Ordinary vision would only see petals, and some would notice the thorns on the stem or the earwig hiding in the folds of the flower; but a sensitive woman, under the strain of an intense emotion generated by deferred or disappointed motherhood, would see a laughing, dimpled face. But is the face there? Assuredly, else how could she see it? Is it not she who makes it? She helps to make it. Only there must also be something more, something objective corresponding to the subjective condition, and the vision is the action and the reaction of these two factors, otherwise we must attribute to her the miraculous gift of creating something out of nothing.

Is not the case on a par with artistic creation? Nature never made a statue, or a picture, or a symphony, in all her wonderful days. Man, with all his inventiveness, could never make these without Nature's aid. She provides the material, he the tools. In a similar way, through the same co-operation, the gods have been made. But being made in that way they are as real as statues or songs, and more enduring, for they gave more trouble to make. See how hard it is to kill the devil. The reason is that he is made of such tough material, and to-day he receives so much nourishment from crowned scoundrels and other high and mighty devotees that he has taken a new lease of life, and will be very powerful in the next generation; but, by the same laws, good gods can be made to resist him. There is a psychological principle underlying the nonsense: "Every time a child says, 'I don't believe in fairies' there is a fairy somewhere that falls down dead." We ought not to let such sweet creatures go out of existence. Let's enlist fresh volunteers. Let's make allies to the good people. For it is said that every strong thought of protective love, every holy desire for another's welfare, every prayer inspired by affection reacting on the plastic psychic matter in Nature, at once informs, vivifies, and endows with its own quality a portion of this responsive substance; something out of our soul goes forth to ensoul it, something of our purposive will to direct it, and it goes to do our bidding though sent to the ends of the earth. Perchance it knows its way also through the domain of death, and will bear our message of undying devotion to those whom we have loved long since and lost awhile.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

JOY AND THE PAPER-BOY.

"THE soul of a cat looks out through a cat's eyes," says a very ancient Irish proverb. The soul of boyhood, irrepressible, deathless, gleams forth into a world that, for the most part, is indifferent from beneath Tim's thatch of tawny, shaggy hair. Cold, hunger, pain cannot quench the spirit in those alert, smudgy-blue eyes of his, eyes sometimes wistful, often merry, and always alive, and always Boy. Those eyes! They constitute Tim's only claim to the notice that might arrest a passing glance, except, perhaps, his useless leg. For Tim's lean pallor and his rags are too common to his kind to attract attention, at least in Dublin streets.

Tim first swam into my ken as the central figure of a group of street arabs at play. And whatever the rules may have been that guided its weird procedure, that game seemed as absorbing to the players as a "scrum" at international football. Dangerous, too. Those were breathless moments when the rounded stone that should have been a ball flew from the pavement that afforded the play-ground into the roadway itself, thence only to be retrieved from under swiftly-passing wheels at imminent but glorious risk. Tim never ventured himself into this part of the fray. Otherwise his agility, his whole-hearted zeal, bordered on the heroic. Crutch and all, he more than held his own. I rather suspect, however, that he was given long odds when this could be done "unnonst" to Tim. For such boys are sportsmen, every inch of them.

The fun was at its wildest, when enter a policeman. The game ceased as if it had never been. Consternation reigned in its stead, but consternation with a defying air, if there be such a thing; withal, jovial consternation. Such interruptions are only to be expected when you play in a crowded street, they lend your game the spice of adventure that is so enchanting, they give it a fearful joy. But the fear is real enough. If you were "cotched" by the peeler....!

In this extremity Tim's crutch was his best friend. It saved his face by affording plausible excuse for an instant assumption of the attitude of disinterested onlooker, leaning gracefully upon a necessary support. Meantime his playmates, dispersing like snowflake in river from the scene of their jolly uproar, had dodged, breathless and laughing, round the street corner, listening unmoved to the splendid and portly official as he thundered forth with stiff dignity, "Be off wid yerselves ou'r this! Yous have no call to be here!"

True. What right have the young Tims to be anywhere—for play, at all events? When they attempt such an outrage they are sure to be infringing on some one else's rights.

Perhaps, then, it is a blessed dispensation that in this level of society boys so quickly pass through the stage of all play. At 10 Tim found himself, through a series of happenings that need not be recounted here, the sole wage-earner of a whining grandmother who drank. The loan of a shilling from a friend in the same line of life started Tim as a paper-boy. He was thus occupied when Joy came across him—Joy, not as an abstraction, but in feminine form, open-eyed for adventure, bubbling over with interest in her kind; foolish and adorable. Joy is an art student, whose sketch-book betrays her low taste in subjects for her pictures. She was always fascinated by Tim and his peers. They soon perceived this. Nothing sharpens your powers of observation like having to depend on them for daily bread. Joy found her path to the Art School being beset by boys beseeching her for "a copper, your Ladyship, in the honour of God!"

I have said that these children are sportsmen. To one of them when sore pressed did Joy once magnificently present the Samaritan dole, on the understanding that this was to free her from further importunities. And sure enough, the following week, an advancing phalanx, swift, barefoot, was arrested by the words, "Let yous be off wid yerselves! Isn't She after giving me tuppence!"

It was all very wrong—the giving, I mean. But Joy was only made aware of the enormity of her conduct later on through the enlightening influence of a certain friend of hers who "had a way wid him." He, having imbibed up-to-date notions relative to indiscriminate almsgiving, imparted the same to Joy. She was deeply impressed. It may have been the teacher. Personality counts in all things.

And thenceforth Joy went her way sobered, sternly aware of her duty to all and sundry of her wide street acquaintance. This is why on Tim's approach one day, with a skipping lightness of movement that suggested the crutch being rather a picturesque than an indispensable adjunct, Joy hardened her heart, like a modern Miss Pharaoh, and said coldly, "Go away! I'll give you nothing! And you in bare feet, too."

"The soles that's after falling off of me oul' boots, Miss...and it ud be two shillings on me to get them mended."

"Then go to the Police-Aided Clothing people."

"You'll only be gev them there, Miss, if you're going to day-schule, Miss, and I do have to be sellin' papers then; its night-schule I do go to, Miss."

Joy began a little to realize that the way of the modern philanthropist is hard. She hesitated, with the usual result. But let her not be blamed too harshly. Those eyes of Tim's! They were largely responsible for Joy's fall from the grace of Benevolence, by Rule. For they now abstracted themselves from the contemplation of a pastry-cook's window, of luscious, of mouth-watering fragrance, to look up at Joy, divinely tall, humanly rosy, and smiling—to look up with shy hope. Never had that dangling leg seemed so pitifully wasted. "Lead us not into temptation" indeed! Those maddening, tempting food displays to the eager eyes of those who must go hungry or steal should be put down with strong hand. A modest placard, however, in that same window announced "Penny-dinner-tickets sold here."

Joy indicated the notice to Tim.

"If I gave you one," she said, tentatively.

"A penny-dinner is it, Miss? Sure, that would be grand! To-day's Chuse-day...hot skew [stew] it does be...its lovely."

But, alas! for the improvidence of the artistic temperament! Not less than a dozen tickets would be sold, and not more than a shilling did Joy's purse contain. Still....

"Here's your ticket," she said, emerging from the shop upon the expectant Tim, "and now I've not got a single penny left for my own lunch."

"Glory, Miss! and what at all will ye do?"

"Do without, I suppose; but what need you care?"

The soft-eyed look with which Joy accompanied this remark neutralised its severity, and restored Tim's soul. He slipped a thin hand into some fastness of his rags and produced a penny.

"Here's wan for yeh, Miss!"

Joy took it, warm and greasy, into her gloved palm. Tim's great eyes beamed now with the glow of the generous giver, while Joy tried to understand why his penny could not pauperise her!

"It must be because I didn't really want it!" she thought, feeling, however, confused still. But she gave this up, and just said to Tim, "But why couldn't you have used that penny for your dinner if you're so hungry?"

"Savin' it I was, Miss, for a couple or three evening 'Late Editions,' but sure, what matter, for this offer....I do often wait till it's night for a bit to eat."

"Here, you'd better take it back for the papers you want," said Joy, with a queer choke in her voice, and she reassured Tim by adding, "I can get something to eat here all right; they know me."

"Well, whatever you say yourself, Miss," said Tim, docile, if disappointed, "you'd be kindly welcome whatever. But if you're ever at a short hereabouts again just give me a call, Miss, for a penny."

GRACE FOR A CHILD.

WHAT God gives, and what we take,
'Tis a gift for Christ His sake:
Be the meal of beans and pease,
God be thank'd for those and these:
Have we flesh, or have we fish,
All are fragments from His dish.
He His Church save, and the King,
And our Peace here, like a Spring,
Make it ever flourishing.

BROAD-MINDED CHRISTIANITY.

THE REV. H. E. DOWSON, B.A., PREACHES AT HOLY TRINITY CHURCH, HYDE.

As briefly reported in our last issue, a combined Service of Intercession for all the members of the various places of worship in Gee Cross was held on Wednesday, December 8, in Holy Trinity Church. There was a crowded congregation present. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Vicar (the Rev. J. P. Richmond, M.A.), and the preacher was the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., who spoke in this church for the first time during his long ministry in Hyde and district. The Rev. Philip Gibbon (Primitive Methodist circuit minister), read the lesson, taken from the 6th chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians.

that believed were of one heart and of one soul" (Acts vi. 32), Mr. Dowson said:—"I do not know any event in my long ministry that has given me greater reasons to thank God than the invitation which I am accepting to-night to speak to you, my fellow-Christians, in this Holy Trinity Church. I grasp the right hand of fellowship held out to me by the Vicar with a catholicity of spirit that fills me with profound gratitude. This is a reunion of all the churches in this dear old village that makes this a red letter day. It really seems a return to the spirit of the first Christians described in our text. That was in the first flush of the coming down upon the founder of our Faith of the Spirit of the Master, inspiring devotion in all hearts and minds to him who was their head—the way, the truth, and the life to them all, revealing to them His Father and their Father, His God and their God. Would that we could go back up the stream of time to breathe the spirit of those primitive Christians—one fold, with one Shepherd—ere the controversies that divide us to-day had been heard of, when the link between the followers of Christ was just the common allegiance to him from whom the life and light and truth of God shone on them. I come amongst you from Hyde Chapel, the tablet above whose door dedicates it to the worship of God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Generation has succeeded generation, with changing thought about the infinite mysteries of God and Christ and Eternity. As a result we do not see eye to eye with you; but that, in spite of it, the Vicar of this church has asked me to speak within its sacred walls is an example of the spirit of Christian brotherhood that breathes in him, worthy of the national position his church holds in our midst. It has made my heart sing for joy with a thanksgiving hymn on my lips, that I have lived to see the day when it is possible for fellowship in Christian worship to overleap wide experiences of thought in those who still have in common their loyalty to Christ. This new union inaugurated here to-day, in common worship, month by month during the war, between our four churches, follows immediately on an earlier union originated in Holy Trinity National School. The four congregations and Sunday Schools then entered into an alliance already rich in its fruits by common labour for the Red Cross Society, the beneficent agency now engaging their hearts and hands in providing for the care of the wounded and supplying their material needs. I think nothing in the village has, in my knowledge, been taken up with more enthusiasm. The new ties of friendship that are formed as our people sit side by side at the board and engage in their common labour of mercy, are great things in themselves. They have done something to lead up to this second bond of union in the common worship which brings us all together for the first time to-night."

After a special reference to the character of the war and the deep moral chasm which separates Germany with her cult of frightfulness from the Allies, Mr. Dowson continued:—

"What a call sounds in the nation's ear, crying to us all to do what we can in a self-sacrifice like that of our brave Gee Cross lads gone, or going out to fight, and to think in our turn, too, of the nation and humanity, and freedom, and justice first, of saving from the curse of Germany the religion of Christ itself, and of doing our share in husbanding the resources of England in the great battle by spending nothing in mere self-indulgence and luxury. This word is needed. The money made and the high wages paid in munition work should not be lavishly spent, but a portion should be saved for the lean years to come. Remember Pharaoh's dream. Living at such a time, so momentous for England and the world, we shall have the eye of posterity upon us. We are making history. We read of the great day when England overthrew the power of Napoleon. Let our children read of the way we vanquished the power of the Kaiser, and saved mankind from his rule of brute force, and religious freedom from going under. I welcome, then, this present closing up of the ranks in our church life, as we assemble together under one over-mastering emotion to lift one common prayer to Heaven to drive out the beast in man that threatens to overrun the world. Yes! in this prayer we are united in face of the foe as we never were before. All division is naught compared with our overwhelming unity as Christians, and as Britons, and as brothers and sisters in the one great family of God, to hold the fort of Christianity against the demon Power that assails it. And there is yet a deeper note this night, as we join in the prayers that have gone up to Heaven from our nearest and dearest, our sons, husbands, and brothers now out in France, in the Dardanelles, and in the Balkans enduring the bitter cold and damp of the trenches night and day; lying in a dug-out for a sleep hard to get, with cold limbs and feet; liable to be called up in the darkness, and to turn out in defence of the muddy strongholds, or to attack a hostile trench, or, in a more peaceful hour, to spend the night in digging some new trench; or, on the other hand, lying under a hurricane of shell, the life carried in the hands the while. We that have our very own going through all that for us, and who have seen our young men from church and chapel and school go out to fight our battles, lift up for them this night our united prayer in asking the benediction of our heavenly Father on the beloved champions of our lives and liberties, and of our common Christian religion, and pray that they may be spared to return home, 'bearing their sheaves with them.' As a minister of Christ, I know, after more than half a century of pastoral labours here and elsewhere, what prayer is to human souls in times of grievous trial and anxiety and sorrow. The child of God falls at his heavenly Father's feet in all his troubles, praying to be lifted up into the eternal arms, and finds strength and comfort in the embrace; and when the nearest and dearest are sick, and their lives are hanging in the balance, the cry goes up from the hearts of those who love them to the Father of all, as ours does this night for the lads at the front, committing them into their heavenly Father's care, and finding comfort in the thought that the eternal love is there amid shot and shell, and cold and wet. As we and they alike rest in it, prayer brings us the peace that came to Christ when His soul was wrapped in the everlasting arms as He prayed 'Thy will, not mine, be done.' So in the prayers to-night in which we pour out our hearts' desires for the life and health of those at the battle front, we beseech God that they may be true and brave whatever comes, and that, if possible, we may see their dear faces again."

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS TO MEN AT THE FRONT.

I.

THE following letter of greeting has been sent by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas on behalf of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, to all its members who are serving in the Army and Navy.

It is with joy that I send on behalf of our Church, a Christmas token of goodwill and a word of greeting to all the men whose names appear on our Roll of Honour. We want you to feel through all the strain and hardship of your lot that you are always remembered by us with gratitude and affection. We know that you dislike to be regarded as heroes and saints when you modestly think of yourselves as ordinary typical Britons, called upon to protect your country and the just and sacred ideals in defence of which we are at war. But though you do not wish to be praised or thanked, we cannot help feeling that in offering your lives for your country you have offered them for each one of us.

What can we do on our part but resolve to discharge our own less trying duties, so cheerfully and confidently, that we shall not be ashamed to look you in the face when you come back with the light of victory in your eyes, and ask us, "Did you trust us all through?"

We are too proud of you to insult you by speaking of our concern that you should honour this Church in brave, chivalrous, and upright lives. Our concern is that we may not dishonour you by failing to approach the standard of high fidelity you have set for us. Because of you we shall hold our Festival in uninvaded homes.

We hope that no peril or anxiety will prevent you lifting up your hearts with ours on Christmas Day, so that across all distances we may be spiritually united in one glad fellowship by memories and hopes, and ties of love and sympathy.

On that day we shall remember you before the Altar of Christ with intercessions and thanksgivings, and we ask you also to remember us. Think of us as we think of you. Pray for us as we pray for you every day of our lives.

We send you a cheer over the spaces that divide us, and our little children wave their hands to you. May God protect you and keep your mind stayed on His righteous will, and rejoice your hearts with the assurance that the day of triumph bringing peace on earth is at hand.

Yours affectionately and gratefully,
J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

II.

A similar letter has been sent to the men who have gone from the Bootle Free Church.

Another Christmastide and yet no "Peace on Earth" nor goodwill amongst the Nations! But there may be peace in the hearts of "Men of Goodwill"; the peace which comes to all who are doing their duty, in whatever form it may come to them.

To you, then, who, amongst the millions of gallant men and lads in our King's Army and Navy, are preparing or actively helping to uphold Righteousness on earth, we, at home, send our loving Christmas greetings, wishing for you the very "Peace of God which passes understanding" even in the midst of war. We pray for your safety of health, body and life if that may be, and above all, safety from the coarsening and debasing effect of much which you must see and hear. With pure hearts and clean hands you can face dangers, deprivations and pains, remembering that the love and prayers of dear ones at home and warm friends far and wide accompany you.

As Members, Adherents, or Scholars of the Bootle Free Church, you will find a new support and stimulus in the fact that your friend and Minister, the Rev. Walter Short, B.A., is now one with you in your patriotic sacrifices, thereby adding to his claims, already great, on our respect and admiration. He has gone to London to train for a Commission, which we all hope he may attain. May he, along with you and the rest of our lads and men, speedily see the end of the war and return to us safe and sound!

You may not have the traditional Merry Christmas, but we hope it may be still a happy one in your heart. The parcel of small comforts, which goes separately, betokens a world of good wishes and affectionate greetings.

On behalf of the Bootle Free Church and of the Ladies' War Committee,

Yours sincerely,

H. W. HAWKES,
Minister Emeritus.

SERBIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

MR. E. C. HARDING writes from Eller Nook, Ambleside, renewing the appeal which he made last February on his 92nd birthday for help for Mrs. St. Clair Stobart's Unit, when he was enabled to send the sum of £235 5s. to the fund. Mrs. Stobart's splendid organisation is achieving wonderful results, and at the present time, in view of the sufferings of the Serbians, the Unit has to cope with difficulties that would be well-nigh insuperable if constant support were not to be relied upon from home. In a letter to Mr. Harding received on October 18th, Mrs. Stobart explained that she had been asked by the medical military authorities at Headquarters to be ready to start in two days' time with a detachment of her Unit to form a Flying Field Hospital attached to the Schoumadia Division of the Serbian Regular Army. This, she said, was an honour, as such work had never yet, she believed, been given to women. The camp where she had previously been receiving the wounded would still continue as a hospital, and smaller hospitals were to be established at Lapovo, and, if possible, at Kralievo. At that time over 17,000 patients had been treated already!

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Accerington.—In order to reduce the deficit on the Church funds a Sale of Work was held on Saturday last in the Unitarian Church school. Mr. E. J. Bradshaw presided, and Mr. J. W. Barlow of Bury opened the proceedings. The result was very gratifying under the existing conditions, about £45 being realised.

Chowbent.—The local weekly paper, called The Atherton Journal, in its "On Dit" column notes that Chowbent Chapel and School raised £14 to provide Christmas comforts for their boys now with the Army and Navy.—That 68 parcels of these comforts have been duly sent to the Dardanelles, France, and other places, so as to reach the boys by Christmas.—That each parcel, in addition to its material comforts, contains a special message prepared by the minister, together with a little khaki-bound pocket-book of spiritual helps, entitled 'On the March,' and consisting of brief prayers, with selected passages of Scripture and verses of hymns suitable for all likely occasions of need.—That the special message, beautifully printed, runs: "Kindest Greetings and Every Good Wish for Christmas and New Year to — from Chowbent Chapel, where, Sunday by Sunday, you are always thought of, and often prayed for. God bless you and keep you, and, in His own good time, bring you safely home again, with duty done."—The same paper reports that on Sunday evening, Dec. 12, the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., of London (secretary of the National Conference), happening to be on a private visit in Bolton, came to Atherton as a friend of the Rev. J. J. Wright, and, by way of helping him, took the evening service. Mr. Harwood was listened to with much appreciation. He spoke ably and earnestly upon "The present crisis from the religious point of view."

Horsham.—A sale of work was held in connection with the Free Christian Church on Thursday, Dec. 9. Over £17 was realised.

Lewes.—Anniversary services were held at the Westgate Unitarian Chapel, Lewes, on Sunday, Dec. 5, the special preacher being the Rev. James Harwood, B.A. (secretary of the National Conference). There were good congregations considering the weather, and the collections were on behalf of the chapel funds. The annual Sale of Work took place in the Chapel Lecture Hall on Tuesday afternoon. The opening ceremony was performed by the Mayoress of Lewes (Mrs. T. G. Roberts), who was accompanied by the Mayor. Alderman J. H. Every, who presided at the opening ceremony, extended a hearty welcome to the Mayor and Mayoress. Mrs. Roberts said that since last year, when she also opened the Sale, many improvements had been made, and the numbers that had been added to the congregation showed how much the work of the Rev. J. M. Connell (Minister of the chapel) was appreciated. The more one knew of his Christian spirit the more one realised how much the unity of a church depended upon the Minister. Lieut.-Col. T. A. Colfox (officer commanding the Dorset Yeomanry now at Lewes) proposed a vote of thanks to the Mayoress for declaring the Sale open. He did not know whether he could call himself a resident of Lewes. He had lived in the town three weeks, and he did not know whether he would be there three days longer or three months. However, he had been in the town long enough to appreciate the good work which the Mayor and Mayoress were doing. The Rev. J. M. Connell, in seconding, said that the members of the congregation had been greatly helped this year in arranging the Sale of Work by the new members, and they were all glad to see so many friends from Brighton and elsewhere present on that occasion. He had to apologise for the absence of three local ministers from that gathering—the Rev. S. J. Cowdy (Congregational Church), the Rev. J. Westland Rose (Presbyterian Church), and the Rev. H. W. Shrewsbury (Wesleyan Church). The Mayor, in the course of a brief acknowledgment, said he greatly appreciated the kindly feeling displayed by the minister of that chapel to all who came to worship within its walls. The chapel itself was not so large as it used to be, but it had been very much improved, and was much more in keeping with the needs of the congregation, and the whole atmosphere of the building was restful and worshipful. Alderman Every, the Rev. B. Wilkinson, and the Rev. J. P. Morris also spoke. A sum of just over £21 was realised. On Thursday, the 16th inst., an address on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund was given to the members of the Literary Society by the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

London.—Mrs. Sydney Martineau writes from Streatham Grove, Norwood, S.E.:—"Will you allow me to draw the attention of your readers to the Class for Religious Instruction for our young people (between the ages of fifteen and eighteen), which will meet under the guidance of the Rev. Henry Gow, at Essex Hall (Lindsey Room), at 11 a.m. on Friday, December 31, Tuesday, January 4, Friday, January 7, and Tuesday, January 11. It is proposed to continue the course in the Easter holidays, and to close with a Dedication or Confirmation service. Parents desiring to avail themselves of this opportunity of bringing our Faith and principles before their boys and girls should send their names to either Mr. Gow or myself."

Rochdale.—The Ladies' Sewing Society of the Unitarian Church has again achieved excellent results in consequence of the Annual Sale of Work. For the fourth time in succession more than £200 has been realised, the amount on this occasion being over £230. The sale took place on December 9 and 11, being opened on the first day by Mrs. H. A. Mince, with Mrs. T. Stott, the President of the Society, in the chair in the unavoidable absence of Miss Hilda W. Carter, who had been announced to preside; and on the second day by a number of the Sunday School children, who gave a charming performance of a little sketch written for the occasion by Mrs. Mince, who for several years has arranged the Saturday afternoon outings and made them an attractive feature. During the year some £65 has been raised for special purposes, including the provision of Christmas presents for soldiers and sailors connected with the church, of whom there are about fifty on the Roll of Honour. To each of these Miss Heape, of Healey Hall, has also made a personal gift.

Scottish Unitarian Association.—The Fifty-Fifth Annual Meeting and Conference of the Scottish Unitarian Association was held at St. Vincent Street Unitarian Church, Glasgow. The annual reports presented showed an increase in membership from 119 to 140, an addition of 21, which, despite the war, was a very healthy sign. The retiring office bearers, Dr. J. K. Wood, Dundee, President; Mr. J. McIntyre, Aberdeen, Mrs. Barlow, Glasgow, Vice-Presidents; Mr. Alexander MacLaren, 360, Argyle Street, Glasgow, Hon. Secretary; and Mr. V. G. Jennings, Hon. Treasurer, were all re-elected unanimously. At the close of the business meeting Dr. Wood, on behalf of his fellow-members of the Executive Committee, presented Mr. A. MacLaren with a purse of sovereigns as a mark of their good wishes on the occasion of his recent marriage, and in recognition of valuable services rendered to the cause of Unitarianism while Hon. Secretary of the S.U.A. Mr. A. MacLaren, in returning thanks, said he was glad to note the gratifying increase which the Association has made during the last five years. To nearly double the individual membership, to exactly double the number of subscribing groups, and to more than double the number of affiliated churches inside a period of five years was, indeed, progress. It all went to show that where activity and enthusiasm can be brought to operate even Scottish Unitarians can move. The substantial advance made should be an impetus to even greater progress in the future.

Stockton-on-Tees.—A successful Sale of Work was held on December 9 and 10 in the Unitarian School-room. It was opened on the first day by the Mayoress of Stockton, supported by the Mayor (Councillor Bertrand Watson), with Mr. W. J. Watson, J.P., in the chair. The Mayoress said that at a time like this she felt the Churches needed all the support that they could possibly get, as Church workers must often feel that their work passed unnoticed in the midst of so many other activities. The Mayor, who is a Wesleyan, said that he was glad of an opportunity to visit the Unitarians because so much in their Church appealed strongly to him, especially their breadth of outlook and spirit of toleration. The Sale of Work was opened on the second day by Mrs. J. Priestman, of Barrow-in-Furness, with Miss Walton in the chair. The amount realised was over £90.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

'THE BOYS' OWN HERO CALENDAR.'

The new Boys' Own Calendar, in the familiar buff cover, should prove very acceptable this year with its brave appeal to all that is noble and unselfish in the heart of man. On every page is the portrait of one of the world's heroic souls—Mazzini, Joan of Arc, Alfred the Great, Abraham Lincoln, William Lloyd Garrison, Florence Nightingale and Nurse Cavell are among the number—with a little autobiographical note, and some characteristic saying appended to each which may be regarded as a motto for the month. A reproduction of Watts's beautiful picture of Sir Galahad comes first to set the right note with those valorous words, "My strength is as the strength of ten, because my heart is pure." The Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, Hon. Brigade Secretary, suggests that captains of companies, or other officers in command, should make arrangements for their boys to learn more about these heroic characters, either in Sunday School classes, or by talks on parade, and supplies a useful list of books dealing with their lives which the boys may be encouraged to read for themselves.

THE CHILDREN AND THE ZEPPELINS.

After reading a number of extracts from essays on air-raids in London collected by Dr. C. W. Kimmins, Chief Inspector of Schools for the London

County Council, we must come to the conclusion that Zeppelins inspire as little real terror in children as they do in grown-up people, though they cause much excitement and awaken intense curiosity. The people who are most frightened are those who express themselves in the most bellicose fashion, and we are led to think that the girls are the worst offenders in the matter of advocating reprisals. The boys positively enjoy a raid, and talk a lot about it, though their descriptions of what occurred, when transferred to paper, seem painfully laconic at times. One young hopeful of ten writes in a matter-of-fact way: "A picture over mother's bed fell on her head and on the baby. The baby went unconscious, and my mother shook her, and then she was alright." A girl of ten has a more vivid imagination: "People were all running about like mad bulls," she says, "and the windows were falling out like rain." One philosophic child says: "I was a bit frightened when the bomb burst, but we have only to die once"; another: "I could have seen the Zeppelins, but I thought, 'If I do I shall always see them when I look up into the sky,' so I would not look at them." Dr. Kimmins alludes to the sad fact that in 95 per cent of the essays no mention was made at all of the father of the family, and even in the other cases the references were not flattering. Men generally, apart from policemen, soldiers, and firemen, were often the subject of uncomplimentary remarks.

THE EDITOR OF Unity.

The Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones and Mrs. Jones are, we understand, among the pacifists on board the Oscar II. An explanation of the reasons which had impelled him to accept Mr. Ford's invitation was given by the Editor of Unity in a recent number. Mr. Jones does not claim to be one of those who believe that this expedition will have much direct influence upon the rulers of the belligerent countries, but he thinks that it will help to formulate the suppressed longing for peace to which some people are trying to give expression, and, for the rest, he has been actuated by a chivalrous desire to support a champion of the cause most dear to himself who has been made "the butt of flippant newspaper ridicule." The attitude is characteristic of Mr. Jones, who is nothing if not fervent in his beliefs, but, if he has really joined Mr. Ford's party, he will be greatly missed by his fellow-workers in Chicago, and the readers of Unity will require all the patience he pleads for during his absence from the editorial chair.

THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

A number of addresses were recently given in Manchester and surrounding districts dealing with the work of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which has now been carrying on its work for thirty-one years. It is stated that last year the Society dealt with 150,000 children in England, Ireland, and Wales. There has been a striking improvement in the conditions of child-life generally in recent months, but there is still a great work to be done, and many thousands of cases have been dealt with in the Manchester district alone in the course of the past year. During that period the branch received 1,562 complaints, involving 4,969 children, but it is interesting to notice that, in consequence, we should say, of the wisdom and tact which are exercised, there were only 37 prosecutions, of which 36 resulted in convictions. The number of cases described as attributable to neglect and starvation was 1,458. Satisfactory as these figures may be in comparison with those of worse periods, they are still appalling from the humanitarian standpoint, and point to depths of moral degradation in some human souls for which drink, heredity, or a bad environment—sometimes all three—are chiefly responsible.

THE Y.M.C.A. AT HOME AND ABROAD.

The work which the Y.M.C.A. is doing at the present time is one of the most remarkable and useful pieces of organisation connected with the war, and, whatever the immediate effect on religion may be, it is certain that thousands of our soldiers will come home with a very different feeling in regard to this institution than they had eighteen months ago. In addition to the numerous huts in the home camps, there are about eighty huts or buildings in operation in France; indeed, wherever the men of the army are sent, whether to Flanders, to Egypt, to Mesopotamia, or to Gallipoli, Y.M.C.A. workers are to be found. A centre is now being opened in Salonika to meet the needs of troops there. In Mudros, which is a rest camp for the army in the Dardanelles, there are eleven centres, and there are also two in Malta. The opportunity which the work affords of getting into personal, living relationship with all sorts and conditions of men, with their various needs, has appealed to numbers of men and women who must have been longing all their lives for just such a chance of making their gift of sympathy widely felt; and however humble their tasks may be, at times, their performance is of the greatest service to others, and wins immediate gratitude.

RELICS OF SORCERY.

Some strange objects recently came under the auctioneer's hammer associated with the invocation of evil spirits and wizard arts in general. Among these was a Tibetan apron of carved human bones which was secured from a monastery by an officer in the Younghusband expedition; a Cingalese devil worshippers' shrine, the central figure representing the principal demon of disease; and three Mu-su or Mosso manuscript books in the rarest of the primitive written languages of the Far East, written by the now extinct wizards of the remote tribes of the Tibet-Chinese hills. According to The Times, the British Museum is said to have no specimen of the writing of which Prince Henri d'Orléans made some attempt to interpret the signs in his book 'From Tonkin to India.' The more important of the three manuscripts contains the wizard's spells and formulæ for working the magic; the other two deal with special incantations to the Spirit of the Hills and to the serpent.
